Ridicule is an effective weapon, but what constitutes humor and ridicule in one country may be utterly ineffective in another. A study of the humor and forms of ridicule behind the iron curtain should be made and the form of humor and ridicule used in any broadcast by the agency should be patterned on the forms that are effectively used by the Russian and satellite governments. Obviously, the Russian and satellite governments know what form is effective for their particular broadcasts. Many of them are filled with vituperation and name calling. This must be effective or the Russian-controlled press and radios would not use it. A complete study of these forms must be made and all broadcasts must be keyed to the particular form which is found to be effective in the country to whom the program is directed. The same thing should apply to all dramatic presentations. These too, must coincide with the psychology of the people who will receive them.

The radio division would likewise be called upon to cooperate with representatives of the State Department, Department of Defense, and Department of Justice for the transmittal of instructions and information to underground movements and agents behind the iron curtain. There undoubtedly should be created a subdivision of the radio division which would operate in the greatest secrecy in connection with the transmission of messages to the underground movements and to agents abroad.

A–3. Literature and photography: This field has been fairly well explored by the Information Service now being operated as a part of the State Department. If the Information Service should be dissolved and its activities transferred to the new proposed agency, good assistance could be obtained from the experience of the Information Service.

There are two schools of thought as to whether the Information Service should be dissolved. One group believes that it should be dissolved because they do not believe that straight information about the United States has proven too effective. The other school believes that the Information Service should be continued and that the proposed propaganda agency should operate as a propaganda organization always attacking the Russian Government, leaving the field of information about the United States to the Information Service. There is merit in both views but it is felt that that portion of the Information Service that broadcasts the Voice of America should probably be transferred to the new propaganda agency where it could participate in broadcasting not only the propaganda programs but also information programs. In this way there would be planned diversity between the two types of programs and one would supplement the other.

It is thought that the name of the Voice of America should be changed to The Voice of the United Nations if the United Nations' approval can be obtained. This would insure cooperation from the broadcasting agencies of other members of the United Nations.

A–4. Special events: This division would handle special and novel types of propaganda and would cooperate with the other divisions, particularly the radio and methods of dissemination divisions, to make it most effective. This division, for instance, could handle the F for Freedom program, the imitation currency program, and other like items.

A–5. Security: This division would have supervision of personnel for security reasons and would of necessity work in close cooperation with the Department of Justice and Department of Defense. The personnel of this entire agency should be classified in such a manner that any employee can be discharged without a disclosure of the reasons therefor.

The matters handled by the propaganda agency would be of such a vital character that it should not be called upon to have to prove disloyalty upon the part of any employee before discharge, and discharge should not be regarded as necessarily being made on that ground.

A–6. Underground activities: This division would handle all instructions and other information to be conveyed to the underground movements. It would of necessity operate in the greatest of secrecy. It possibly should check all programs distributed to see that they coincide with policies for conveying information to the underground movements. It would operate also in cooperation with the Department of Defense and the Department of Justice, and possibly also with the Department of State.

A–7. Military activities: This division is similar to A–6, except that it would be primarily interested in the transmittal of instructions to agents. It also would work in cooperation with the Department of Defense and Department of Justice. It might be deemed wise to combine A–6 and A–7 into one division. It will be noted that the executive committee contains no representative of either A–6 or A–7. It is felt that the omission of these divisions from the executive committee would increase secrecy.

A–8. Research: This division would, as its name implies, be engaged in research and would cooperate particularly with the radio division (A–2), literature and photography division (A–3), and special events division (A–4). There also would be some coordination between this division and the analytical division (A–1), although the analytical division is primarily engaged in determining the effectiveness of the programs issued and the audiences created rather than obtaining information for the preparation of propaganda.

A–9. Budget and Finance: This division would be charged with the duty of handling all financial matters and making adequate recommendations to the executive committee. It would of necessity make the accounting system coordinate with that used in regular Government accounting. It would be responsible for the preparation and submission to the executive committee of a budget for its consideration and would be charged with general office administration.

A–10. Personnel: This division would handle the same work that is ordinarily handled by a personnel office. It would have charge of the screening and hiring of employees. Before employees were hired, it would work in conjunction with the Department of Justice to determine whether or not such an employee would be a good security risk. It would keep all personnel records and would also, upon instructions of the manager or his second assistant, discharge employees.

A–11. Public relations: The American people are entitled to know within the limits of military and internal security, what this agency is doing, what it is trying to accomplish, and how it operates. This division would be charged with informing the public in this country with such information as was not secret under internal or military security, and for this purpose would cooperate with the press, and possibly arrange for a speaker's bureau which could provide a limited number of speakers throughout the country. It also should handle all complaints or criticisms of the agency, affecting its public support or its operations.

A–12. Methods of dissemination: The task of this division would be to develop new and novel methods for the dissemination of propaganda behind the iron curtain. There are, of course, two established methods—radio, and the use of underground movements and foreign agents. Other methods must be devised, developed, and made effective, and they can be if the vision and will to do so are present. The employees of this division will have to be men and women of great vision and some imagination. This division will directly cooperate with the research division, radio division, literature and photography division, and above all, the special events division. It would likewise perform such special tasks as might be assigned to it within its field by the manager of the agency.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. CAIN was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate for the remainder of today.

PETITIONS IN BEHALF OF RAILWAY LABOR BILL

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I hold in my hand 76 petitions with a total of over 2,000 signatures sent to me by my constituents in Massachusetts. The petitions state:

> We now understand this measure, S. 3295, is pending business before the Senate when Congress reconvenes on November 27 and should receive immediate consideration. Since time is therefore of the essence, we are taking this means of petition to remind you that we shall sincerely appreciate your voting favorably on this bill and giving it any other support you may be able to in order to secure its early enactment at this session of Congress.

Mr. President, I shall vote against the motion to displace the present unfinished business of the Senate, S. 3295, a bill to amend the Railway Labor Act and to authorize agreements providing for union membership and agreements for deductions from the wages of carriers' employees for certain purposes and under certain conditions. I shall vote against the motion, not for the purpose of delaying the taking up of the bill which would give statehood to Alaska but because I believe the Senate should keep the commitment it made last September. If S. 3295 is taken up and disposed of, I then shall expect to vote to take up the bill for statehood for Alaska, if the majority party gives it the order of preference at any time.

When the Senate adjourned on September 23 last, S. 3295 was made the unfinished business. As I understood at that time, this was done so that we might proceed in orderly fashion as soon as we reconvened. Relying on the fact that the Senate in good faith had made S. 3295 the unfinished business and that there would be an opportunity to discuss it on its merits, many citizens of Massachusetts have written and petitioned me in the hope that this faith would be kept. I have told them that I am in favor of the general principles of this bill.

Mr. President, I believe the Senate should stick to the schedule which it set up for itself last September 19. While, of course, I would vote to displace S. 3295 if any measure were brought before us directly dealing with our national security in these very critical times, I cannot see that statehood for Alaska is of such immediate necessity that we should displace the present unfinished business. For the reasons I have given, I shall vote against the pending motion, which would displace the railway labor bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I ask the Senator whether in his judgment there is any prospect for an early vote upon the bill which is the unfinished business, the amendments to the Railway Labor Act?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I hope there is. I will say very sincerely to the Senator I understand there are two or three pending amendments which concern directly the language contained in the bill, which amendments are not greatly disputed. I may be wrong in that, but that is my understanding. There are some dilatory motions of which I do not approve and which I would vote to lay on the table.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I wonder whether the Senator from Massachusetts has had the same information which I have had, namely, that debate upon the bill, the amendments to the Railway Labor Act, would be used solely for the purpose of delaying action upon the statehood bill?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I can truthfully tell the Senator that I have not had that information, either as gossip, underground, or in any other way.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator it came to me directly from a member of the body who is himself an opponent of the statehood bill. It was for the reason I want to make it perfectly clear that the supporters of statehood do not want to delay action upon these bills, and feel that the Railway Labor bill is being used solely for the purpose of preventing action upon the statehood bills, that I have asked the Senate to vote on the motion to take up the Alaska statehood bill. So far as I am concerned—if I may say an additional word?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Certainly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Alaska statehood bill is taken up I should be the first to have it laid aside temporarily for the purpose of disposing of the other bill if there is any opportunity of disposing of it—which I may say I gravely doubt.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that several people at home spoke to me when I was there, expressing their desire that the bill dealing with the amendments to the Railway Labor Act be considered. I have in my hand numerous petitions making the same request. It is difficult for people at home who do not know the procedure in the Senate to understand why one bill is displaced when they understood it was going to be considered. I committed myself, I hope honorably, to take up that bill and to vote on its general principles, and I want to carry out my commitment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am sure that the Senator always acts honorably and desires to carry out his commitments, but the people back home who have communicated with him are probably not aware that the Railway Labor Act amendments bill has been buried in the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives, which has refused to grant it a rule. They are probably not aware of the fact that the opposition to that bill was so great—in part coming even from railway labor—that before the Senate adjourned in September it was clear that a motion to recommit was about to be made, and probably would carry. So those who desire in good faith to advance the report of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I think would do well to cooperate in the effort to secure a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon this matter—a request which I shall be very happy to make, but which I am sure, when it is presented, will demonstrate that the request for action on the Railway Labor bill is merely a design to prevent action upon the statehood bills.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In reply to the Senator, all I can say is that I have not received that information, and I do want to fulfill my commitments.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCLELLAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. Why is not the railway labor bill under debate at this time?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator was not present on the first day of the session. First, there was the unanimous-consent request made—and the Senator from Wyoming will correct me if I am wrong—to consider the bill providing statehood for Alaska, ahead of the railway labor bill. Unanimous consent was objected to. Then the motion we are now discussing was made by the majority leader.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is it not a fact that the proponents of statehood for Alaska are delaying consideration of the railway labor bill?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I most respectfully say that I would not want to become involved in a dispute as to questions of procedure between two Democratic colleagues, for both of whom I have the greatest respect.

Mr. EASTLAND. But why is not the railway labor bill under debate at this time?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I believe the Senator from Wyoming attempted to answer the question now asked by the Senator from Mississippi on that subject, and my oratorical ability is not equal to his.

Mr. BYRD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Gurney	Murray
Butler	Hayden	Neely
Byrd	Hoey	O'Mahoney
Cain	Hunt	Saltonstall
Carlson	Ives	Schoeppel
Cordon	Kem	Stennis
Donnell	Kerr	Taft
Ellender	Kilgore	Thomas, Utah
Ferguson	McClellan	Thye
Flanders	McFarland	Wherry
Frear	McKellar	Wiley
George	McMahon	Williams
Gillette	Martin	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present. The clerk will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Chief Clerk called the names of the absent Senators; and Mr. BRICKER, Mr. HILL, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. LANGER, Mr. MAYBANK, Mr. MILLIKIN, Mrs. SMITH of Maine, and Mr. TAYLOR answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After a little delay, Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. JOHNSON of Texas entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

After a further delay, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. CLEMENTS, Mr. DWORSHAK, Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. ECTON, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GREEN, Mr. HENDRICKSON, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. LEHMAN, Mr. LUCAS, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MALONE, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MYERS, Mr O'CONOR, Mr, RUSSELL, Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, Mr. SMITH of North Carolina, Mr THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. TOBEY, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. WATKINS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union.

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a dilatory speech. I wish to voice my opposition to the motion which is now pending to consider the Alaska statehood bill. I also wish to voice my opposition to the passage of the bill. It is very difficult to understand why at this time in the world's critical situation it should be deemed of importance to bring forward a bill to grant statehood to Alaska, to be followed by a bill to grant statehood to Hawaii. Certainly there is nothing at all to indicate that such measures are so pressing or vital that they should be taken up at this time at the expense of the consideration of urgent and important matters which now confront Congress, the people of the United States, and the world.

I do not subscribe to the theory that it is necessary or essential to pass a statehood bill for Alaska or for Hawaii in order to satisfy the propaganda machines of the Soviet Union. It has been suggested that to grant statehood to Alaska and Hawaii would be a good answer to the charges which are made against America, of aggression, imperialism, or any other purposes America may have in mind with reference to its dealing with other nations of the world. If the long standing and consistent history of America through all the intervening years in her dealings with other nations has not demonstrated and established the fact that she has no imperial designs whatever, certainly we cannot do so by passing a bill granting statehood to Alaska or Hawaii.

We have demonstrated throughout our past history in dealing with other peoples of the world, especially with those who came under our directorate, that we had no purpose except to serve the territories or islands of the sea which came into our possession as the result of war. For example, we have granted independence to the Philippine Islands. We have granted independence to Cuba. We have not sought to keep in subjection any people of the world. Therefore, there is no basis for any charge that America does not intend to deal generously with any of its possessions.

Personally I would be entirely willing to grant independence to Hawaii. I have no desire to keep the islands of Hawaii permanently as a part of the United States. I am not in favor of taking any islands of the sea or other territory not contiguous to the mainland of the United States and making them a permanent part of the United States. I believe we should limit the privilege of statehood to Territories which are contiguous and adjacent to the mainland of the United States. If there is any reason for going out to the islands of the seas and taking them in as States, there will be no place to stop. If the Hawaiian Islands are granted statehood, the argument will be made that Puerto Rico also should receive similar treatment. There would then be no reason for denying such a claim. I believe we should adhere to our original concept in dealing with the islands of the sea that come into our possession, with the idea of benefiting them and putting them on a firm foundation. We have always done more for all the islands of the sea which have come into our possession than has been done by them for the United States.

Another point I wish to make is that when we have so many vital matters pending in Congress and before the country we should seek to get unity in the United States. I believe unity to be the supreme need in our Nation today. We should not take up the time with discussion of controversial measures which do not vitally affect the United States. Why should we spend our time in such discussion? We should discuss matters which are of vital concern and which affect the unity of the Nation, and not spend our time in discussing controversial measures on which there is wide difference of opinion.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. One of the proponents of the bill stated that the admission of Alaska and Hawaii as States would give us a bulwark and spearhead against subversive activities. I wonder whether the Senator would state if it is his opinion that granting statehood would give us such a bulwark and spearhead against subversive activities. Does not the Senator think it shows the extremes to which proponents of the measure are resorting when they make such arguments?

Mr. HOEY. Undoubtedly so. I regard that as no more than an oratorical flourish. There is no basis or justification for such an assertion, and there is no proof that granting statehood to Alaska would furnish any spearhead or bulwark against subversive activities of attacks against the United States. We have already done all that can be done to build Alaska and Hawaii as strong as we can make them. Granting statehood to them would make no contribution to that end.

Mr. President, it is rather interesting to note who it is that advocates statehood for Alaska. It is a well-oiled propaganda machine. In Alaska itself there is a wide difference of opinion on the subject. The last time an election was held in Alaska, some 2 or 3 years ago, approximately 16,000 votes were cast, 9,000 were cast in favor, and a little less than 7,000 were cast against. I understand that since that election there is even a greater division in Alaska.

This morning I heard the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] raise the point whether or not the Indians in Alaska were not now in opposition to statehood. I have information on very reliable authority that last Friday in Craig, Alaska, a convention was held by the Brotherhood of Natives, which represents the Indian population of Alaska, which numbers one-fourth of the population of the Territory. Governor Gruening went to the meeting to make a speech, because he knew that the Indians were rising up against statehood for Alaska. He made the speech with the idea of having the convention adopt a resolution in favor of statehood for Alaska. He spoke for a long time. When the resolution was offered not a single delegate to the convention voted in favor of it. On the other hand, they adopted a resolution against it, and adopted it because of a certain provision in the bill. A great many of the Indians had voted for statehood when the question was before them originally, 2 or 3 years ago, but this bill contains a provision I should like to read. I do not know how much it would affect them, I am not passing upon that, but I know that they think it would deprive them of their ancestral heritage, and therefore they are opposed to the bill. This is the provision in the bill to which they object. It is section 5, subsection (1):

> (1) Pending action by the people of Alaska and the Congress as provided in this act, no reservations for use and occupancy of the natives of Alaska shall be designated in the Territory by authority of any law of the United States, and no act of Congress applicable to Indians not now applying to the Territory of Alaska shall be made applicable to the Territory except by specific authorization of the Congress.

They feel that this would deprive them of the right to reserve for their own use any part of the lands they inherited from their aboriginal ancestors. I do not know whether it would have that effect or not, but they at least think so. As a result, this Native Brotherhood Assembly, representing practically all the Indians of Alaska, voted unanimously for a resolution not to agree to the bill, and they refused only last Friday to vote for a resolution recommending statehood.

Mr. President, I mention that to show that in Alaska, when the vote was taken 2½ years ago on the proposition of whether or not they would like to have statehood, and there was no such provision in the bill, the division was almost even, or about 3 to 2. The Indians having given their verdict against it, in all probability if an election were held now the proposal would not receive a majority of the votes cast in Alaska.

We hear reference made to this bill having passed the House by an overwhelming majority. That is not a fact. A majority of the House has not voted on the bill; but a majority of those voting on the occasion when the bill was passed did support it. There are 435 Members of the House. One hundred and eighty-six voted for the bill, one hundred and forty-six voted against it. More than a hundred did not vote at all, as they were absent. Therefore, in attempting to ascertain who is for the bill and who is against it, certainly it must be admitted that there is not a preponderance of opinion in favor of it among the people of Alaska or the people of the United States.

Another matter which I think is worthy of consideration is that when we are asked to make Alaska a State, we are asked to take into the Union a Territory larger than any State in the Union and with a smaller population. The total population of Alaska is between 110,000 and 120,000. But they are not all permanent residents. Included in that number are about 12,000 Government employees in Alaska, in many agencies, some of whom have their families with them, so that they form 26,000 or 30,000 of the population.

Furthermore, there is an Indian population which numbers about 30,000, or more, and of course that includes Indians and the Eskimos. It should be borne in mind also that a great deal of public work has gone on in Alaska not connected with Government employees, but projects maintained by the United States Government, on which a large number of people are employed, and a number of those have been counted in the census as temporary residents of Alaska.

Therefore, when we analyze the situation, we find that the population of Alaska amounts to no more than the population of an average county in the United States, and yet we are asked to vote on the preposterous proposition of granting to Alaska statehood, and giving her two United States Senators to represent about what is an average county in a State in the United States. It seems to me that is going far afield in the matter of determining the right of a particular element of our people to have statehood.

It has been said there has been great development in Alaska, and that Alaska has enormous resources. Alaska does have great resources. It did have a great deal of gold. In the year 1941 there was mined in Alaska $28,000,000 in gold. Yet in 1949 there was mined only $8,000,000 of gold. So that gold production has dropped from $28,000,000, in 1941, to $8,000,000 in 1949. Taking all of Alaska combined, with its vast area of 365,000,000 acres of land, we find that only three-tenths of 1 percent of the land is in private ownership. Of this vast area of 365,000,000 acres only a small number of acres are owned by private individuals. Ninety-nine and seven-tenths percent of the total acreage of Alaska is owned by the United States.

There is talk about Alaska being a rich country, and there is much land there. Yet, in the whole domain of Alaska there are only about 600 farms. That is not any more than we find in an average county in the United States. In my State of North Carolina, or in the State of Missouri, or in the State of Pennsylvania, there are about as many farms in a single county.

When we come to think about the Territory of Alaska, and the wealth of Alaska, and the resources of Alaska, we find that they have not been developed because people do not want to stay there in the extremes of climate which are found there. California has developed marvelously because of its climate and its resources. Alaska has not been developed, not because it has been a Territory, but because of the extremes of climate, and the fact that there is no appeal to people to go there and remain permanently. Most of those who have gone to Alaska have gone for the purpose of exploration and development, and to get what they can, and when they accomplish their purpose they return to the United States. The same process has continued through the years, and will continue.

Merely granting statehood will develop the resources of the country; the granting of statehood will not make the land inviting, and those who do not like the climate or other conditions which exist there will not remain. Therefore it is far afield to say that all Alaska needs is merely to be granted statehood, and that she will proceed with her development.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. HOEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to make another suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina. As he knows, I have served a great many years on the Committee on Appropriations, and so far as I can recall we have never turned down a request looking to the aid and betterment and upbuilding of the Territory of Alaska. The present occupant of the chair [Mr. McCLELLAN] will join me in that statement, I know, because he is a member of the committee. So far as I can recall, I do not remember any bill of any kind intended to help the great Territory of Alaska being turned down. I know the Senate has been unusually considerate of the Territory of Alaska, and has helped it along in every way.

Looking at the matter solely from the standpoint of the Territory of Alaska, the land and the people, I doubt if there would be as good a government there, if statehood were granted, as now exists, because our whole country seems to feel that we should look after the people there and help them, and we do that.

I desired to call that to the attention of the Senator in connection with what he has just been telling the Senate. He is correct in what he says, there is no doubt, and I am sure no one in Alaska would complain that their government is a poor government because their needs have not been taken care of.

When we come to a State, we find conditions very different. In one sense, as conditions now exist, the people of Alaska are the wards of the United States Government. If Alaska took on statehood, I doubt very much whether that situation would continue. So, looking at the matter from the standpoint of the people who reside in Alaska—and there are not many of them—it would not be as well for them to have statehood as to continue under the present condition.

Mr. HOEY. I thank the Senator from Tennessee, who is the very able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. What he says is absolutely accurate.

In that connection I desire to call attention to the fact that last year the budget contained $71,000,000 for Alaska. There is talk about Alaska paying taxes and not having representation, and it is said, "Here is taxation without representation." The total amount of taxes paid by Alaska to the United States last year was a little more than $18,000,000. Yet we paid back to them $71,000,000. So our administration over them is a very benevolent sort of administration. We certainly are not taking advantage of Alaska, and she is not suffering because she does not have Senators here or Representatives in the House of Representatives.

Of course, Alaska has a Territorial Delegate in the House, and he is very able and alert, and very attentive to his duties in looking after the interests of Alaska. But aside from that, as the distinguished Senator from Tennessee has said, since Alaska is a Territory, the obligation is felt by the Senate and the whole Congress to see to it that Alaska has every consideration for her development and for all the projects which are needed.

Presently the taxes in Alaska are higher than in any State of the Union. The taxes under their own government budget are about $8,000,000. The United States pays the expenses of the Territorial government, and for other purposes it pays more than $70,000,000.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question on that point?

Mr. HOEY. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that the taxes imposed in Alaska now, for purely local Territorial purposes, are higher than any tax we have in any State in the Union? If that be true, it is a fact which is new to me.

Mr. HOEY. That is my information about the matter. I have not verified it fully, but the source of my information, I think, is reliable.

Mr. STENNIS. Does not the Senator understand from the figures he has, and which he has given to us, that this tax burden would be tremendously increased if statehood were granted?

Mr. HOEY. It would be more than doubled.

Mr. STENNIS. If they cannot carry such a burden, where will the money come from? Will it come from any other source than the Federal Treasury?

Mr. HOEY. Not at all. Presently their own budget is about $8,000,000, and the United States makes contribution to the Territorial government and the agencies which the State would have to provide for, if Alaska were made a State, amounting to more than $10,000,000. That is the situation which now confronts the people of Alaska. When we consider these figures we can better understand the problem, and realize that the people of Alaska would not be benefited by the granting of statehood.

In line with what the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has said, the budget for Alaska for the fiscal year 1951 amounts to about $112,000,000. We are going forward and making provision for additional development of roads, and for other projects in Alaska. Alaska is receiving preferential treatment already, instead of being denied any of its rights or any of the opportunities for development.

A few moments ago I mentioned the payment of taxes by the people of Alaska to the Federal Government and the contention that they do not have adequate representation here. I do not think I need to emphasize that any more than to say that that condition applies always to any Territory. Alaska has the representation in the form of a Delegate in Congress, who is reenforced by a sense of justice on the part of the Members of both Houses of Congress, who will see to it that the interests of the Territory are adequately provided for, and that the Territory is not discriminated against.

Mr. President, I was thinking about the conditions which exist in Alaska, and about the Territorial government. Some time ago the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] submitted a resolution providing for an investigation of a condition which existed in Alaska, with reference to the Territorial government and certain interests in Alaska undertaking to put over a deal on the United States with respect to the Palmer Airport. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments of the Government, and was considered by the subcommittee of which I am chairman. In view of the information furnished by the Senator from Nebraska, we felt some further investigation should be made.

Following that I sent to Alaska a representative of our staff, an attorney, and an investigator. They went into the matter rather fully. Of course, the investigation was simply a preliminary one. Their investigation disclosed, however, the methods adopted by some of those who are now proceeding to try to bring about statehood for Alaska, in their efforts to obtain money from the Federal Government.

As Senators know, Congress has passed the National Airport Act, under which the Government gives aid and assistance to the States in the building of airports. Under that policy the Government pays 25 percent of the cost of the acquisition of sites for airports, and then sometimes as much as 75 percent of the cost of the construction. The Palmer Airport Association filed an application with the CAA in connection with the Palmer Airport. The matter was under negotiation. They later, however, conceived the idea of obtaining enough money from the Federal Government both to pay for the site and for the building of the airport. In order to do that they cooked up this sort of a scheme: They entered into negotiations with those who had the title to the airport with the idea that those who had the title should deed it to the Territorial government of Alaska at a stipulated sum of $150,000. It was agreed at the same time that after that deed had been made and the payment had been given, those to whom the money was paid would refund $145,000 of it, leaving the site to cost only $5,000. That was done.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of the original transfer which was made. I also hold in my hand the original check which was given for the $145,000 refund to the Territorial government, after the association had made the purchase, solely for the purpose of filing that with the United States and undertaking to secure a large appropriation.

For instance, under date of April 11, 1950, the Palmer Airport Association, of Palmer, Alaska, transferred 127.94 acres of land to the Territory of Alaska for $150,000. As I say, I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of the transfer of the title.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOEY. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. How much of that figure was the Federal Government to pay?

Mr. HOEY. What they were doing was this: They were going to file an application to receive pay from the Federal Government, and in doing so they would set forth how much the site would cost, and then the Federal Government was supposed to pay 25 percent for the acquisition of the site. That was done under the general law which covers such procedure in relation to the building of airports through the country. The amount represented was $150,000. That was done on April 11, 1950. On April 17, 1950, the Palmer Airport Association executed this check which I hold in my hand—it is the original check—for $145,000, and returned it to the Territorial government, showing that they were only receiving $5,000 for the site.

In line therewith they amended their application for assistance from the United States, on the basis of which they would be entitled to receive $37,500 in connection with the site. In addition to that they were going to receive three-fourths of the cost of construction. So they filed a new application. When they filed the latter application, they asked for a total of $293,500, or $163,500 more than they had asked for in the January 9 application.

Before that time they had made a smaller request. The admitted purpose was to have the Government pay both for the site and all the cost of the airport base.

This, of course, is a private concern. It is not a Government concern. But it was dealing with a matter which concerned the Territory of Alaska. Territorial officials were joined in the matter. The active members of the organization helped to put through the proposition which would have defrauded the Federal Government by which they would have obtained money on the basis of a site which was costing much less than had been indicated. They had spent considerable money on the airport, some $58,000, but even when they had the United States engineers appraise the airport their total appraisal of everything connected therewith amounted to only $131,000. They had gotten some friendly appraisers to make appraisals. One appraisal was $150,000. Another appraisal was $175,000. That is the basis on which they filed the application, and changed the amount to $193,500.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOEY. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. What was the date of the transaction?

Mr. HOEY. April 7, 1950, was when they obtained title, and they issued the refunding check on April 17, 1950.

Mr. STENNIS. Would the Senator mind pointing out what it was that brought the matter to light, and what stopped the transaction? What caused those concerned to recede from their position?

Mr. HOEY. I imagine the investigation did. I do not necessarily mean the investigation made by my subcommittee, but the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] made a speech, in which he called attention to the matter and gave information about it. The matter was discussed on the floor. When the resolution was referred to our committee I asked that the matter be held up until we could make an investigation. The investigation has not been completed, but it has gone far enough to show the facts I have set forth.

Mr. STENNIS. As I understand the Senator, he, as chairman of the subcommittee, had to request the Department of the Interior to hold up the matter.

Mr. HOEY. Yes. We notified the Department of the investigation and asked that nothing further be done until the matter had been looked into.

In order that there may be in the RECORD a statement as to the orderly process of the proceeding, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a short summary made by a member of the investigating committee. The statement shows what processes were adopted and what method was followed in connection with undertaking to put over this matter.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Alaskan officials of Division of Aeronautics planned to collect, retroactively, funds from the CAA in order to reimburse itself for moneys spent on the Palmer Airport prior to the passage of the required enabling act, which act became effective on June 1, 1949. Territory of Alaska had spent approximately $50,000 prior to June 1949. Territory not legally entitled to any Federal matching funds until after grant agreement negotiated. On November 23, 1949, George Schwamm, Director of Division of Aeronautics, and Stanley McCutcheon, attorney (also member of Territorial legislature), submitted request for Federal aid of $94,750 against total estimated cost of completing Palmer Airport of $130,000. Project application submitted on January 9, 1950, upon receipt of advice that Palmer Airport included in CAA allotment, and estimated Federal share of costs reflected as $94,750, same as in previous requests for aid. Federal aid authorization of this amount rejected by Alaskan officials under date March 15, 1950, one month after CAA authorized grant agreement. New project application submitted March 15, 1950, wherein estimated Federal share is $145,125, while sponsors' share would be $148,375. Total estimated cost was shown as $293,500, or $163,500 more than January 1950 application. Increase due to alleged error in that Territory did not own land at Palmer Airport until April 11, 1950, when check issued to Palmer Airport Association for $150,000. Palmer Airport Association returned $145,000 to Territory. Territory to grant association the right to reacquire the airport and donate it to the town site of Palmer when and if Palmer became incorporated. Land actually cost Palmer Airport Association approximately $10,000, but no deed or written agreement executed by original owners to anyone until April 1950 and thereafter. Deed prepared not legally proper nor ever recorded. Three friendly appraisals submitted report to Schwamm, valuing property from $155,000 to $171,000. Corps of Engineers appraisal of identical acreage is $27,626. Balance of funds to credit of Division of Aeronautics at time, $150,000; check issued was only $147,569.14. McCutcheon confessed he did not know what statements appeared in project applications submitted to CAA in January 1950 and in March 1950, notwithstanding fact he certified to legal accuracy of statements made. Stated he may have certified that he was giving the Territory back to the Russians. McCutcheon caused Palmer Airport Association officials to place a value of $150,000 on the airport land in order that Territory could receive 25 percent thereof credit in matching funds, $37,500. Roland Snodgrass, secretary of Palmer Airport Association, admitted "selling" three friendly appraisers on idea that land was worth at least $150,000. Governor of Alaska in touch with Chris Lample, of CAA, in effort to get Federal aid for funds spend by Territory prior to passage of enabling act. Lample hand carried both project applications at Washington, D. C., in order to expedite and answer any questions which might be raised by Washington CAA officials. Local officials not as yet contacted. Schwamm admitted Territory did not intend to pay out any of its funds in completing Palmer Airport to No. 3 status. Advised no appropriation covered by Commissioners for expenditure of funds on Palmer Airport in 1950. Nevertheless, prior to investigation by this subcommittee, Schwamm advertised and entered into contract with low bidder to complete airport at cost of $121,277.70, and, in view of contract, Territory obliged to spend funds to meet payment, notwithstanding fact that no appropriation made therefor. Schwamm has attempted to collect 75 percent of construction cost expended in 1950, but payment of Federal funds held up pending completion of instant investigation. Also noted that William Lavery, member of Aeronautical Commission, was told by Schwamm that Frank Barr appointed in his place for "expired" term. This action taken before end of term and without obtaining his resignation.

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I brought that to the attention of the Senate because I feel that the matter is sufficiently vital to justify us in giving it sincere consideration. I believe there should be still further investigation before we pass upon the matter.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HOEY. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. May I inquire of the Senator from North Carolina if the men representing the Alaskan Territorial government who participated in this transaction did not include the Speaker of the Territorial house of representatives?

Mr. HOEY. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is it not correct that the Territory of Alaska in the 1949 act established a commission to deal with aviation and communications? I believe it was called the Alaskan Aeronautics and Communication Commission. Is it not correct that that commission was established by an act of the Territorial legislature in 1949?

Mr. HOEY. That is true, as shown by the investigation made by our representatives.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then was not the speaker of the Territorial house made chairman of that commission, a man by the name of Stanley McCutcheon, I believe?

Mr. HOEY. The record will show that.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Was it not the duty of McCutcheon, in the position he occupied, to certify as to the total ownership of the land which was involved in the applications for Federal aid for the airport construction and also for the acquisition of the land?

Mr. HOEY. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. As I understand, two applications were made. In the first application they certified that they owned this land and that it was of a certain value—as I remember, approximately $30,000. When that application was approved by the Civil Aeronautics Administration in Washington, and when the application was returned, is it not true that the same commission in Alaska, representing the Territorial government of Alaska, rejected the approval, and then submitted the second application, in which the same man, a member of the Alaskan commission, Stanley McCutcheon, in the second certification certified that they did not own any of the land, and therefore made application for $150,000?

Mr. HOEY. That is correct, and that is set forth in the memorandum which I had inserted in the RECORD a few moments ago.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then it appears, does it not, from the investigation made thus far—and I understand that these facts are substantially undenied by the principal parties involved, whom representatives of the staff of the Senator's committee have questioned in person about these matters—that it was a scheme to actually misrepresent the facts and to defraud the Federal Government of sufficient funds not only to pay the Federal Government's part of construction but also of sufficient funds to pay the Territorial government's part of both the acquisition and the construction costs?

Mr. HOEY. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Territorial officials of Alaska who have that authority actually participated in the scheme, which was discovered, and which the able Senator has called to the attention of the proper authorities; and action by the Senator and his committee has prevented the money from being paid and has prevented the fraud from actually being consummated.

Mr. HOEY. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOEY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I am sorry I was not present to hear all the Senator reported; but if I correctly understand what he has stated, it is that a complete and detailed investigation of this transaction will be made and a report submitted to the Senate as soon as possible.

Mr. HOEY. That is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. Did the Senator from North Carolina indicate when that will be available?

Mr. HOEY. As I indicated before the Senator entered the Chamber, one of the assistant chief counsel for the committee and one of the investigators went to Alaska and obtained this preliminary report, and submitted it. The report gives the information which I have given. Practically all of it is uncontradicted; practically all of it is shown from the record.

In order to make a further investigation, it will be necessary to examine witnesses. Our committee expects to go forward with the investigation of the matter and to procure the full information.

However, the facts I have mentioned are those which are shown on the records and the papers and by the admissions made by those who were contacted by the staff representatives in Alaska.

Mr. BUTLER. I may say, Mr. President, that this matter was called to my attention during the committee hearings on the statehood bill. I think the members of the committee, on both sides, regardless of party affiliation, are entirely fair. I wish to say, for the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, that I have been on that committee for a number of years, and I have never seen any matter handled by it on a partisan basis.

At the time when I made that disclosure, it was suggested that the matter was entitled to be investigated, and, therefore, I submitted the resolution which was the basis of the investigation which the Senator from North Carolina has been conducting.

If the information which was brought to me, and which I reported, was correct, it is a very important matter to be explored thoroughly and to be reported to the Senate before we take action on the Alaska statehood bill, because the people involved are, as a group, those who are managing practically all the public affairs and questions in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that the first information I had about any of this matter was when his resclution was submitted and was referred to our committee.

Of course, the Senator from Nebraska very kindly furnished the information he had. Based upon that information, the committee was of the opinion that the matter should be investigated; and therefore we proceeded immediately.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not the plan of the chairman of the subcommittee to subpena witnesses?

Mr. HOEY. Yes. We expect to examine the witnesses later. This preliminary investigation was completed about a week ago. We expect to examine witnesses and to go into the facts fully. However, we felt that since the statehood matter was now under discussion, the Senate should have the benefit of this preliminary investigation which shows matters which are not disputed and which are sustained by the record.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield at this point?

Mr. HOEY. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. At what time did the investigation begin?

Mr. HOEY. The investigation in Alaska began about 2 or 3 weeks ago.

Mr. ANDERSON. When was the resolution submitted?

Mr. HOEY. I should say that the representatives of the committee went to Alaska about a week or so after the recess was taken. As soon as the resolution was submitted and was referred to our committee, we began here on the investigation. We looked into the matter somewhat. Then, after doing that, we decided that we should send the representatives to Alaska. That was done.

Mr. ANDERSON. Did the committee call in any persons from the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs who might previously have made an investigation of this matter?

Mr. HOEY. They did not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Did the committee call in the Governor of Alaska?

Mr. HOEY. The staff members visited Alaska and called everyone there who might have information about this matter. However, we decided that, in addition, we wished to summon witnesses for a full hearing and to give full attention to all aspects of the matter, and to have the hearing as soon as possible.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would the Senator's attitude be any different if he could have before him uncontradictable evidence that $150,000 had been spent on the airport?

Mr. HOEY. I do not think that is the matter in controversy.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it is very definitely the matter in controversy. Statement is made, with reference to the airport, that there is no question about what took place.

It is like a person who engages a good lawyer to help prepare his income-tax returns, so as to be able to obtain the maximum benefit. In the case of this particular airport, the question is not whether $150,000 had been expended, but the question is whether $150,000 had been expended by the private individuals who owned the land.

The work of clearing the airport had been completed. There had been a terrific expenditure of money on the smaller airport. When the larger airport was required, it would obviously have been unfair to pay the private owners of the land for work done by the Territory of Alaska, work subscribed to by private individuals in Alaska. All those factors went into the matter.

One hundred and fifty thousand dollars had been spent. If it had not been spent, I think that would be an interesting fact for the committee to develop.

However, so far as I can find out, the Senator's committee has made no effort to ascertain whether $150,000 was spent, but only has tried to determine whether the holdings of the private owners of the land were worth $150,000. It is admitted that they were not.

The only way the people of Alaska could be taken into consideration was by means of proceeding in the way these people did.

I do not think the Government was defrauded of a single dime. I think the matter was handled in the way that has been followed over and over again in this country in cases in which precisely the same recognition has been given—although not in exactly the same fashion—to expenditures already made by private individuals.

That is why I am hopeful that the Senator from North Carolina will join us in trying to get this bill to the floor of the Senate, so that we may expose and explore these various matters and may get reasonable explanations for them, instead of refusing to permit the bill to come before the Senate and have them discussed before the final passage of the bill.

I am quite sure that my distinguished friend, the Senator from North Carolina, whose reputation for fairness is so strong that I need not comment on it, will eventually find that the facts are as I have outlined them, namely, that the expenditure was made, that there was no question as to the total investment of funds, but that the private owners of the land, who are private citizens of Alaska, should not have profited out of the enterprise, through the money they had turned into the development of a smaller airport, which now is to be developed into a larger airport.

Mr. HOEY. I say to the Senator from New Mexico that of course our committee had no previous notions or opinions regarding this matter. We were called upon to make the investigation, and we began it. I sent the staff to Alaska to get all of the facts in this connection. I directed them to obtain the information as fully as possible.

When they returned, they made this preliminary report, and said they thought it would be necessary to summon certain officials in order to get a full statement of the facts.

Mr. ANDERSON. They are here now. Would it be objectionable to summon Governor Gruening, who today is in Washington?

Mr. HOEY. I do not know whether we could hold a committee meeting today, but I should be glad to take up the matter at any time and to have all the facts developed.

However, I do not think this matter should be rushed. I think the persons in Alaska who have any connection with the transaction should have full opportunity to present the full facts, and I think all the facts should be laid before the Senate. I cannot understand why there is such a hurry to get this matter handled or why it should be pressed until we can investigate it.

After all, when we pass a statehood bill, that is the end of the matter. This is not a question which I think should be gone into hurriedly or ill-advisedly or without giving it full consideration. I should want full opportunity given to explain all aspects of it.

However, when the Alaskan Territorial government pays $150,000 to the Palmer Airport, with the agreement and understanding that they are going to refund $145,000 back to them, I do not understand how such a transaction could be considered as being open and above board.

Mr. ANDERSON. This subject was before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in June, when the committee reported the bill. It had been my request, and that of other members of the committee, that this question be fully investigated. Somehow or other, it has not been investigated.

Mr. HOEY. The first time it came to us, we acted on it. It came when the resolution was submitted in the Senate and was referred to our committee. The full committee, through its chairman, referred it to a subcommittee, and it was taken up. I knew nothing about it in advance. I had not heard of any investigation. I did not know that the matter had been brought up before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Our investigation was merely to undertake to ascertain the facts.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HOEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I should like to inquire whether the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs has made an investigation of the subject. If a thorough investigation were made by that committee, the facts might be disclosed, and it might not be necessary to conduct a further investigation. If such an investigation has already been made by another committee, I am not aware of it. Has the Senator from North Carolina information that another committee, having original jurisdiction over the Territory, has made such an investigation?

Mr. HOEY. We had no information that any investigation of that type had been made, and the only reason we made it was that the resolution was referred to us, as the distinguished Senator from Arkansas knows.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The resolution was referred.

Mr. HOEY. We had no desire to interfere in any way, but, when the resolution was referred to the full committee, and later to our subcommittee, we proceeded to consider the subject. Had I known that an investigation had already been made, I certainly should have inquired about it in order to see whether it was really necessary for us to go forward.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOEY. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to make sure that the RECORD shows that I do not question in any way the manner in which the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has handled the investigation, or the speed with which he has handled it. I only say that the subject came before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in June, and I should like to have seen it investigated immediately. I think it should have been investigated, either by that committee or by the Senator's committee.

Mr. HOEY. I will say to the Senator from New Mexico that if there are any additional facts, I should be very glad to have them. I should be very glad to incorporate such material or the results of any other investigation which might add to our knowledge of the facts.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOEY. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Before the Senator concludes, I should like to subscribe to the statements made by the able and distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and to state that during the 2 years in which I have had the privilege of serving on the Appropriations Committee, I know that we have undertaken to deal generously with Alaska in all of its problems with reference to public improvements and other matters which are now the responsibility of the Federal Government, and which will become the responsibility of the State government if and when Alaska is admitted to statehood. I know that the Appropriations Committee and its able chairman have been most sympathetic toward her every request. Each request has received appropriate consideration; and, as I recall, in practically every instance Alaska's requests for funds have been granted.

Mr. HOEY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. President, I had about concluded all I wished to say. As I said in the beginning, I am not making a dilatory speech. I am not trying to delay consideration of the bill. However, I do not believe that this motion ought to be agreed to. I do not believe that statehood should be granted to Alaska. When we undertake the task of admitting another Territory to statehood, it becomes an important matter. When a Territory is ready for statehood, and when its admission would be of benefit to the people of the Territory and to the United States as a whole, I do not believe it should be denied admission. I do not believe that the granting of statehood to Alaska would confer any benefits upon the Territory of Alaska. I am quite sure that it would not confer any benefits upon the United States. Under such conditions, I think the Senate could very much better occupy itself in the consideration of matters of present vital concern and importance, than in debating this question, which could very well be debated next year, or the year after, or 5 years from now, without any detriment to the public good.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCLELLAN in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Gurney	Millikin

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). A quorum is present.

THE KOREAN SITUATION

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a cartoon published in today's issue of the Washington Evening Star. The cartoon shows an elephant and a donkey, both pretty much scarred up, after what seems to be intended to represent a fight. In the background is shown a radio set. From the radio set are issuing the words "United States faces gravest danger. Chinese Reds drive UN forces back in fierce attacks." Then both the elephant and the donkey look up and say, "Hey, there's a war on."

I presume the inference intended to be drawn from the cartoon—and I am not finding fault with it—is that the Republicans and the Democrats in Congress are fighting while there is a war going on, and that they are unaware of that fact.

Then I find a subheading in the same issue: "Nation in peril, action needed, Secretary says"—meaning Secretary Acheson.

Then I find down below that the Secretary is quoted as saying, "Must be ready for worst." Below that the following:

> "No one can guarantee that war will not come," Mr. Acheson said. "The present crisis is extremely serious"—

And so forth.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I am very happy to yield.

Mr. BRICKER. I should like the Senator to advise whether or not the radio depicted is a Capehart machine?

Mr. CAPEHART. Now if I may continue——

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield further?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. BRICKER. The purpose of the question was to find out whether or not the reception was good.

Mr. CAPEHART. I shall not answer the able Senator from Ohio, because, frankly, I am in no frame of mind——

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President——

Mr. CAPEHART. To make answer to such a remark as that; and I shall not yield to the Senator from New Mexico at the moment either.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I thank the Senator for his kindness and patience.

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes; I shall be very happy to yield. Go ahead.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Would not the answer be dependent upon who is listening to the machine?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I rose to talk about this cartoon, not to criticize the newspaper. In the cartoon we find the words, "Hey! There's a war on!" I should like to ask a question. What war? The President of the United States has described the Korean incident as a police action. The Secretary of State in a speech last night said, "No one can guarantee that war will not come." What does the President of the United States call what is going on in Korea? And what does the Secretary of State mean when he says, "No one can guarantee that war will not come." Well, is war here?

My next question is this: What do the President of the United States and the Secretary of State want the Congress to do? What bill is there before the Congress that they would like to have passed immediately in respect to what the President of the United States calls a police action? The Secretary of State evidently ignores the fact that there is a war because he says, "No one can guarantee that war will not come."

To me the situation is serious. I am certain it is serious to every other Senator. I know it is serious to the 200,000 American boys who are in Korea.

I shall not take the time to read much more matter appearing on the front page of the newspaper, which describes in great detail how a division of our marines has been caught in Korea.

But what does the President of the United States want the Congress to do? What does the President of the United States want the American people to do tonight? The President of the United States is the only person in the United States who has access to all the facts. I do not have access to them. No other Senator has access to the facts. The Senate as a whole does not have access to the facts. Only the President of the United States is in possession of all the facts. Why does not the President of the United States give the facts to the American people? Why does not the Secretary of State give the facts to the American people? Why does not the President of the United States tell Congress what he wants Congress to do, or what he thinks Congress should do in order to help in this situation, because he and he only has the facts?

Why is it necessary to publish a cartoon such as I am looking at here, which leaves the impression—it must leave the impression, and I presume the intention was to leave the impression—that the Republicans and the Democrats in the Congress were fighting while a war was going on? That is not going to build up morale in the United States; and I do not think it is going to build up morale in the United States for the President of the United States and the Secretary of State to deny the fact that there is a war.

I do not believe anyone can successfully contradict what I am going to say. I know that many Senators might well rise and say that the senior Senator from Indiana did not vote for all foreign-aid measures, and they would be correct. But I do not think anyone can successfully contradict what I am going to say, and that is that the Congress of the United States has given the President and the Secretary of State, if not everything, then practically everything they have asked for in respect to foreign affairs, and have given them everything they have asked for in respect to the present Korean situation. What more do they want? What do they want the Congress to do? What do they want the people to do? Why does the Secretary of State say, "No one can guarantee that war will not come"? Why does he make that statement when we are at war today? Why does he make the statement, which was listened to last night by I do not know how many million people, that war may come?

If the situation is serious, and it is serious—it is always serious when a nation is at war, if we are at war, and we are at war—why does not the President of the United States consult with the Congress of the United States? If I remember correctly—and I do—the President of the United States did not ask for a declaration of war when he moved into Korea, or when the United Nations moved in, if Senators care to put it in that way. The President of the United States did not ask Congress for a declaration of war the other day when the Chinese Communists moved in.

He has not come before a joint session of the United States Congress and reported to the Congress and to the people, and said, "Here are the facts. Here is the situation. Here is what I think we ought to do."

Senators will remember that in the late days of the Congress, before we adjourned in September, the Congress passed what was known as the 1950 Defense Production Act, and that act—and I believe I know what I am talking about, because I am a member of the committee which held hearings in connection with it—gives the President of the United States the right to control, 100 percent, the domestic economy of the Nation. It gives him the right to control prices and wages, and to ration. It gives him the right to return to wartime controls. Yet he has only put into effect a very small portion of the powers conferred on him by that act. He is controlling credits on durable goods. He is controlling credits on housing. He has reduced the use of aluminum for civilian goods about 35 percent, and maybe a few other insignificant provisions of the act have been put into effect.

I am asking these questions as a Member of the United States Senate. With 260,000 American boys fighting in Korea, I am asking the questions.

I do not like to have the people of my State say, "What are you doing?" I am receiving, as I know other Senators are receiving, literally dozens and dozens of telegrams and letters. I have received many of them today after Mr. Acheson's speech of last night. Then I pick up this newspaper and I see the cartoon on its front page.

I rise to ask the President: "What do you want Congress to do? What do you want the people to do? Are we at war or are we not at war? What can we do as a Congress that we have not already done?" The people, if I judge their temper correctly from my mail and the telegrams I am receiving, are becoming a little bit dissatisfied in respect to the Congress. They wonder why Congress is not doing something.

What can we do? What should we do? How can we do anything without having the facts? The President and the President only has the facts. I know I would be willing and I know every other Senator would be equally willing and anxious as I am, to sit here day in and night out to do whatever is necessary to win the Korean War. We cannot do it until the leadership of our Nation tells us what should be done. We can appropriate more money; we can raise taxes. However, appropriating more money at this time possibly will not help the boys in Korea. We have already appropriated billions upon billions of dollars.

So, Mr. President, I close by asking the President of the United States to tell the American people the facts, based upon the information he has, inasmuch as he is the only person in the United States who has access to all the facts. Let the President tell the Congress what laws he thinks the Congress should pass, and let the President tell the American people what he thinks they should do.

I think the time has arrived when that should be done. I am hopeful that the President will do so, because I do not think we are helping the world situation or that we are helping ourselves when the Congress is put in such a light as it is as a result of the cartoon to which I have referred, which is absolutely unfair, unwarranted, and unjustified, because I am certain that the Congress will do whatever is necessary to be done in time of war.

Mr. President, I do not know how other Members of the Senate feel about the matter; but so far as I am concerned, it is war, and it has been war for many, many months. Why our leadership and the President and the Secretary of State do not recognize it as war, but continue to try to fool the American people into believing that it is a police action, I cannot understand. I repeat that the Secretary of State himself, when speaking to the American people, said:

> No one can guarantee that war will not come.

Now war is here. It is not coming; it is here now.

I repeat that I cannot understand why the President and the Secretary of State do not so inform the American people, and why they do not come before the Congress and tell the Congress what they think should be done; because they, and they alone, have the facts.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. LUCAS to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union.

Mr. LEHMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LEHMAN. Gladly.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, yesterday some questions arose as to certain statements. I now ask unanimous consent that I may read briefly from those statements and may supplement them by having certain matters printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from New York, if that is permissible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator request that he be recognized for that purpose at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from New York?

Mr. ANDERSON. I should be happy to do so either now or at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to make the statement now?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield for that purpose, with the understanding that the remarks of the Senator from New Mexico will follow those of the Senator from New York?

Mr. LEHMAN. Yes; provided I do not thereby lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The further remarks by Mr. ANDERSON appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of Mr. LEHMAN'S speech.)

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the real issue here in connection with the Alaska statehood bill is whether Alaska is prepared for statehood and whether granting statehood to that Territory would be in the best interests of the United States. As a member of the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, I was in almost constant attendance at the hearings in April of this year when the issues were thoroughly explored. Before the hearings, I felt that Alaska should become a State; at their conclusion I was convinced of it. The granting of statehood would be in harmony with tradition. Every argument which has been raised on this floor and elsewhere against Alaska statehood is, on analysis, discovered to be merely a restatement of the same arguments made against admission of the western territories. The analogy between them and the arguments against the admission of Alaska in almost every instance is strikingly similar.

I am one of the representatives of the State which, in point of population, is the largest in the Union, and my State pays into the Federal Treasury more tax revenue than any other State does. It is my firm belief that the people of the State of New York do not object to the fact that the approximately 130,000 citizens of Alaska will have with statehood, the same representation in the Senate as do the almost 15,000,000 people of New York State. I make that statement with deep conviction, because during recent months in my home State, while I was a candidate for reelection, I publicly declared time after time my endorsement of Alaska statehood; and I found general acceptance there of the proposition that this Nation would be aided by adding this Territory to the Union of States. Long ago, our forefathers made the decision that representation in the United States Senate should be on the basis of political areas, not population; and who is there to say that this system of government, giving as it does proportional representation in the House of Representatives, has not worked well for the people, has not caused this Nation to flourish and to grow and to become the leading country of the world?

In the Union of the Thirteen Original States, there was wide disparity as between the populations of the several States. For example, Virginia had over 500,000 people, while Delaware had only 37,000. Indeed, at that time Virginia had more than double the population of my own State of New York; and later, when Indiana was admitted in 1816, Virginia and Pennsylvania and New York each had over a million persons within their borders, while Indiana had less than 25,000. When Illinois became a State 2 years after Indiana, it had only about 50,000 people. In those days, too, and later, arguments were made—but they never prevailed—that it was wrong to give a handful of people the same voting strength in the Senate as was enjoyed by the more populous States. Who could say now, and who would say, that it was a mistake to admit Indiana and Illinois?

It is contended that there is nothing in statehood itself to bring about progress. The only answer is that progress has always come when statehood was granted. Perhaps this is due partly—and it might be even principally—to the fact that the people of a State are released from long-distance government and are given greater latitude and greater opportunity to shape their own destiny.

For the sake of the RECORD, let me list here the populations of some of the States at the time of their admission, other than Indiana and Illinois, and the populations at the same time of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York:

State	Date	Population	Virginia	Pennsylvania	New York
Vermont	1791	85,425	747,610	434,373	340,120
Kentucky	1792	73,677	747,610	434,373	340,120
Tennessee	1796	60,000	880,200	602,368	589,051
Ohio	1802	42,366	880,200	602,368	589,051
Louisiana	1812	76,506	974,600	810,091	959,049
Mississippi	1817	75,448	1,065,366	1,049,458	1,372,812
Missouri	1821	66,586	1,065,366	1,049,458	1,372,812
Arkansas	1836	52,240	1,239,797	1,724,033	2,428,921
Florida	1845	72,000	[1] 1,239,797 [2] 1,421,661	[1] 1,724,033 [2] 2,311,786	[1] 2,428,921 [2] 3,097,394
California	1850	92,527	1,421,661	2,311,786	3,097,394
Oregon	1859	52,465	1,596,318	2,906,215	3,880,735
Nevada	1864	42,491	1,596,318	2,906,215	3,880,735
Idaho	1890	82,385	1,655,080	5,258,113	6,003,174
Wyoming	1890	60,703	1,655,080	5,258,113	6,003,174

I wish to draw particular attention to the States which were admitted within my lifetime. Idaho, in 1890, had a population of 82,385. At the same time, Virginia had a population of 1,655,000, while Pennsylvania had a population of 5,258,000, and New York, a population of more than 6,000,000. Wyoming, admitted in the same year, had a population of only 60,700, while Virginia had 1,655,000, Pennsylvania 5,258,000, and New York, more than 6,000,000. So it is clear that Wyoming had less than 1 percent of the population of the State of New York, yet it was willingly admitted into the Union of States, and certainly has proved to be a great asset to the United States.

In his remarks on Tuesday, the distinguished junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] expressed concern over the fact that such a small amount of land in Alaska has moved into private ownership. It is correct to say that that fact is not unknown to Alaskans who advocate statehood, and they have urged that statehood would play a measurable part in correcting the situation. The junior Senator from Mississippi stated that the two Senators from Alaska would represent only 1,500 square miles of land or "just about the size of one good county in Minnesota or two counties of Mississippi." I hope I may be permitted to point out to my friend from Mississippi that he is badly in error. Senators from a State of the United States represent, not the land which is privately owned alone, but all the land within the borders of the State. If the rule is that private land and private land only is entitled to have a voice in the United States Senate, then I suggest that some changes should be made in many other States of the Union. I do not know how much State-owned land there is in Arizona, for instance, but the records show that the Federal Government has title to 73 percent of the land there. In the great State of California, 45 percent of the land is federally owned. In Colorado the percentage is 38; in Idaho, 65; in Nevada, 85; and in Utah, 73. So we should not for a moment accept the proposition that only in Alaska has the United States Government title to a substantial part of all the land.

Even more importantly it should be said, and emphatically, that not only would Senators from Alaska represent the total area within the borders of the State, but the very bill upon which I hope the Senate will act makes provision for conveying to the State 22,000,000 acres of land. That would not only enable the State to accelerate the process of increasing private ownership of land but would allow the State government to retain for the benefit of its people land which should remain in public ownership. We should note well, too, that the decision as to which part, if any, of this State-owned land shall remain in public ownership will be made by the people of the State themselves and not by distant government.

If we were to accept, even improperly, the suggestion that Senators have a right only to represent that portion of their States which is under control of the State itself or is privately owned, let us make inquiry as to what the Alaska situation would be. I am informed that conveying 22,000,000 acres of land to the State of Alaska would give the people of Alaska a land area greater than is contained in each of the following States: Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Vermont, West Virginia, and South Carolina. So the contention that Alaska Senators would represent only the equivalent of a couple of counties in Mississippi or one county in Minnesota falls precipitately of its own weight.

This is not the first time, as has been said, that the United States Senate has faced the proposition of admitting a Territory unconnected with the present States. In a day when transportation was far, far slower than it now is, there was a gap of 210 miles between Tennessee, the nearest State, and Louisiana when the latter was admitted. And California was 470 miles away from Texas, the nearest State, when California entered the Union.

The President of the United States has declared that the passage of this bill is highly important for our national defense and also for the sake of our Nation's prestige abroad. The Department of State has declared in formal testimony before our committee that the grant of statehood to Alaska and Hawaii would be most meaningful and significant for the support of our world policy.

I am not a military expert and do not pretend to speak as one. Certainly, however, we must give full faith and credit to the recommendations of the President of the United States and of his military advisers who are and must remain responsible for the defense of this country and of its interests in these perilous times. We must give full faith and credit to the advocacy of statehood by the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force. Among the supporters of Alaskan statehood, in addition, are General MacArthur, General Eisenhower, and Admiral Nimitz. Certainly these men understand the advantages of statehood for the national defense.

These military men understand, as we all do, that the inclusion of these Territories in the Union as States must inevitably result in greater attention being given in the Congress to the defense needs of these areas and, what is equally important, to the fuller participation of these areas, their population, and their resources in all the defense undertakings of the Nation.

Alaska's contribution to the national defense consists not only of the air bases and other military establishments located there, but also in the cooperation and participation of the inhabitants of Alaska in national defense undertakings—not only in the defense of the area of Alaska, but of the entire Nation. A uranium mine developed in Alaska or a lead or zinc or other mineral deposit developed there can be a vital contribution to the national defense. Statehood will stimulate such developments.

I need not labor the point about how important the admission of these two Territories as States is for the sake of our prestige in the world and our foreign policy. The Far East especially is vitally interested in what we do with Alaska and Hawaii. The grant of full statehood to these two areas with their melting pot complexions, in the case of Hawaii, and with the large proportion of Indians and Eskimos in the population of Alaska—will help convince the peoples of the Far East that Americanism is a way of life, a way of freedom whose aim is equality of citizenship status for all. Statehood for Alaska and Hawaii will help convince the peoples of Asia that racialism is not a part of our democratic philosophy.

I need not emphasize how vital this is for the sake of victory and for the sake of unity among freedom-loving peoples.

I hope that the pending motion is approved and that the Senate will agree without further delay to take up these vital measures.

During the delivery of Mr. LEHMAN'S speech,

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, at this point let me say that some question was raised as to when Alaska became a Territory. As early as 1896, the Supreme Court of the United States held, in effect, that Alaska was a Territory, in the case of The Steamer Coquitlam v. United States (163 U. S. 346). I now ask unanimous consent that a citation from that case be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As early as 1896, the Supreme Court of the United States held, in effect, that Alaska was a Territory. In the case of The Steamer Coquitlam v. U. S. (163 U. S. 346 (1896)), the Court stated:

"Alaska is one of the Territories of the United States. It was designated in that order (referring to the order of this court assigning the ninth circuit) as has always been so regarded. And the Court established by the act of 1884 is the last resort within the limits of that Territory. It is, therefore, in every substantial sense the Supreme Court of that Territory."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, Alaska was a Territory from the time of annexation in 1867. That question was decided squarely in 1905. I ask unanimous consent that a citation relating to that matter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

That Alaska was a Territory from the time of annexation in 1867 was decided squarely in 1905 when, in handing down the Court's opinion in Rasmussin v. United States (197 U. S. 516), Chief Justice White stated:

"Indeed both before and since the decision in Downes against Bidwell the status of Alaska as an incorporated Territory was and has been recognized by the action and decision of this Court. * * * It follows then from the text of the treaty by which Alaska was acquired, from the action of Congress thereunder and the reiterated decisions of this Court, that the proposition that Alaska is not incorporated into and a part of the United States is devoid of merit, and therefore the doctrine settled as to unincorporated Territory is inapposite."

Mr. ANDERSON. In that connection, Mr. President, there is a concurring opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan. I ask unanimous consent to have an excerpt from it printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The result is summed up in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan who said:

"Immediately upon the ratification in 1867 of the treaty by which Alaska was acquired from Russia that Territory, as I think came under the complete, sovereign jurisdiction and authority of the United States, and, without any formal action on the part of Congress in recognition or enforcement of the treaty, and whether Congress wished such a result or not, the inhabitants of that Territory became at once entitled to the benefit of all the guarantees found in the Constitution of the United States for the protection of life, liberty, and property."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, the decision cited article III of the Treaty of Cession. I ask consent to have that Article printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the Article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The decision cited article III of the Treaty of Cession which reads: "The inhabitants of the ceded territory, according to their choice, reserving their natural allegiance, may return to Russia within 3 years, but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they, with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property and religion. The uncivilized tribes will be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States, may from time to time, adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a list of laws subsequent to the Treaty of Cession and prior to the organic act by which Alaska was considered de facto a Territory. There are some six of those laws. I ask unanimous consent to have a citation of them printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The laws subsequent to the Treaty of Cession and prior to the organic act by which Alaska was considered de facto a Territory are:

Act of July 20, 1868, concerning internal revenue taxation;

Act of July 27, 1868, extending the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce and navigation and establishing a collection district;

Revised Statutes of 1873–74, sections 1954–1976 carrying forward these previous provisions;

Act of May 17, 1884, constituting Alaska a civil and judicial district and establishing a civil government, providing for a governor and other offices and for a district court and making general laws of Oregon applicable to the Territory;

Act of March 3, 1889, establishing a criminal code and code of criminal procedure; and

Act of June 6, 1900, making further provisions for civil government, including a code of civil procedure.

It was not until 7 years after the Supreme Court decision in 1905 in the Rasmussen v. United States that Congress enacted the so-called organic act for Alaska, August 24, 1912.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, a question was asked as to what military leaders have advocated statehood for Alaska. First let me say that Louis Johnson submitted a letter on that subject to the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs on April 18, 1950. As then Secretary of Defense he urged the admission of Alaska into the Union. I ask unanimous consent that his letter, together with subsequent letters written by him and by the Acting Secretary of State, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, April 18, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: This letter is further in response to your communication of March 30, 1950, in which you make reference to two bills, H. R. 331 and H. R. 49, which, if enacted, would admit the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, respectively, into the Federal Union as States. Because I understand that your committee intends on April 24 to commence hearings on H. R. 331, which concerns Alaska, and to hold hearings beginning May 1 on H. R. 49, the Hawaiian proposal, I address this letter to you for the purpose of expressing the concurrence of the Department of Defense in both proposals.

As you know, the administration has repeatedly expressed itself as favoring Hawaiian and Alaskan statehood and both proposals have again and again been introduced by the President. On January 4, in his state of the Union message, President Truman urged that the Congress during 1950 grant statehood to Alaska and Hawaii. The enactment of H. R. 49 and H. R. 331 would, I believe, effectively accomplish this objective.

You asked in your letter of March 30 as to whether from the point of view of national defense, it would be advantageous to extend statehood to Alaska and Hawaii, and you inquired specifically as to whether statehood would give greater strength to our military position in those areas than does the present territorial type of local government. It is obvious that the more stable a local government can be, the more successful would be the control and defense of the area in case of sudden attack. There can be no question but that in the event of an attack any State would be immensely aided in the initial stages of the emergency by the effective use of the State and local instrumentalities of law and order. By the same token it would seem to me that, as persons in a position to assist the Federal garrisons which might exist in Hawaii or Alaska, the locally elected governors, sheriffs, and the locally selected constabulary and civil-defense units all would be of tremendous value in cases of sudden peril. Therefore, my answer to your question is that statehood for Alaska and Hawaii would undoubtedly give a considerable added measure of strength to the overall defense of both areas in event of emergency.

I am not attempting in this letter to endorse the specific language of either of the bills under consideration, but I do wish strongly to support the principle of granting immediate statehood to both the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii as in the best interest of the United States and of all of its peoples both here and in the Territories.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, September 15, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have just received your letter of September 13 asking me if I would like to express any views with respect to statehood for Alaska and Hawaii in addition to the views which I expressed in my letter of April 18 to you.

I have nothing to add to the views I have previously expressed on this subject, other than to say that recent events in the Pacific seem to me to give added point and emphasis to the statements contained in my letter of April 18.

With warm personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 19, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: This is in reply to your letter of September 12, 1950, regarding the Department of State's views on bills for admission of Hawaii and Alaska into the Union, and inquiring whether recent events in Korea have in any way caused the Department's views to be changed.

The views of the Department as set forth in the letter of April 20, 1950, have not been modified by the development of the Korean conflict. Indeed, the Department believes that the Korean situation has increased the urgency for favorable action on these bills and has rendered more compelling the reasons set forth in my letter of April 20, 1950.

Sincerely yours,

JACK K. MCFALL,
Assistant Secretary
(For the Secretary of State).

Mr. ANDERSON. So far as other representatives of the Armed Forces are concerned, let me list only a few. For instance, Gen. H. H. Arnold, now deceased, was a member of the National Committee for Alaska Statehood. Of statehood he said:

Upon Alaska our future may well rest. What, then, would be better; what would insure a greater provision for our future than to recognize that most important area and make it a State, equal to our other 48 States?

Gen. William Donovan, wartime commander of the OSS, is still another high military figure who favors immediate Alaska statehood. He is a member of the National Committee for Alaska Statehood.

When Gov. Ernest Gruening, of Alaska, was in Tokyo in November 1949 he talked with General MacArthur about Alaska statehood. General MacArthur told Governor Gruening he would be glad to serve as a member of the National Committee for Alaska Statehood. So General MacArthur became a member of that committee.

Admiral Chester W. Nimitz' adherence to Alaska statehood is revealed by the fact that he is a member of the national committee to advance the cause of statehood. Admiral Nimitz signified by letter his belief that Alaska should be a State, and at that time he accepted membership on the national committee.

Rear Adm. Richard E. Byrd is not only a member of the National Committee for Alaska Statehood but has lent active and continuing support to the cause of statehood for Alaska.

Finally, Mr. President, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, when speaking in Denver on September 16 last, urged that Congress enact the Alaska statehood bill without delay. I ask unanimous consent that an excerpt from his remarks on that occasion, as they appeared in the Denver Post of September 17, 1950, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALASKA, HAWAII STATEHOOD SEEN AS SIGN TO WORLD

Quick admission of Alaska and Hawaii to statehood will show the world that "America practices what it preaches," Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower said Saturday in a brief talk to 1,500 Denverites gathered at the freedom bell.

The famed war and peacetime leader declared admission of the two Territories is "in conformity with the American way of life," granting them self-government and equal voice in national affairs.

PRACTICAL SYMBOL

Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood will serve to the people of the world as a "practical symbol that America practices what it preaches," Eisenhower said. He said he hopes Congress would soon pass admission legislation now before it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Finally, Mr. President, I hold in my hand a statement by Robert P. Patterson, former Secretary of War, strongly supporting statehood for Alaska. This statement was addressed by him to the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. I conclude by asking unanimous consent that the statement be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF ROBERT P. PATTERSON, ATTORNEY AT LAW AND FORMER SECRETARY OF WAR, NEW YORK CITY, SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1950, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS ON ALASKA STATEHOOD

I strongly support passage of the Alaska statehood bill.

When Secretary Seward in 1867 negotiated the treaty for purchase of Alaska Territory for the sum of $7,200,000, the cynical spoke of Alaska as "Seward's ice box" and condemned the transaction as a flagrant waste of public funds. Time has proved that Seward's treaty was one of the wisest steps in statesmanship ever taken by our Government. Time has also made it clear that the final step in recognition of Alaska—statehood like that of the 48 States—should be taken promptly.

When an American citizen moves to Alaska from New York, Illinois, Texas, or Oregon, he is nonetheless an American citizen, living on soil that has been American for 83 years. Why should he lose the right to participate in the Nation's affairs?

I support statehood for Alaska on many grounds. In simple justice to the 100,000 Americans who live there, Alaska should be the forty-ninth State. Some may say that 100,000 are not so many people; but half of our present States did not have 100,000 inhabitants at the time of their attainment of the status of a State.

I also believe that statehood will be to the advantage of the entire Nation— politically, socially, economically. There can be no question that the resources in Alaska, rich but now largely latent, will be developed more rapidly when Alaska is recognized as a State, a full-fledged partner with the other States.

I will not take the time of the committee with detailed discussion of these matters, but will confine what I have to say to the advantages the United States will derive in national defense by recognition of the claims of Alaska for statehood.

I am thinking back to those anxious days in 1942, 8 years ago, when the Japanese threat to Alaska was one of our gravest concerns. We had lost command of the Pacific for the time being. Our route to Alaska by sea—and we then had no other access—was uncertain. The Japanese had seized Attu and Kiska in the Aleutians, and no one knew what they would try next.

In the War Department we were well aware of how weak our defenses were. We did our best to expand the chain of airfields that ran from Minnesota up to Fairbanks. We started the Alcan Highway, locating it where we did as a support for those airfields. We undertook the Canol project for a supply of oil to be delivered from northwest Canada to Alaska, expensive, it is true, and severely criticized at the time, but thoroughly sound as a war measure.

It was brought home to me at that time that our chief difficulty in defending Alaska was the problem of supplying military forces there. It would do no good to place troops there if they could not be maintained, kept equipped, and moved from place to place. A solution to the supply problem in Alaska was the key to success in defense of the United States against attack from the northwest.

Alaska was not lacking or deficient in most of the raw materials needed for supply of military forces. It had timber, minerals, petroleum. What was lacking, what was deficient, was the population to develop the available resources. The Territory was so thinly peopled that the resources in the soil could not be converted into useful products save on the most meager basis.

Five years later, in 1947, the War Department made an intensive study of Alaska defense under "cold war" conditions. There was general agreement that the defense of Alaska was vital to the defense of the United States and that the defense of Alaska should be geared to air operations. There was also general agreement that nothing would strengthen our defenses in Alaska as much as an increase in population, to the end that the basic resources of the area might be utilized for supply of the defending forces.

What was true in 1942 and in 1947 is true in 1950. The prime need in national defense, so far as Alaska is concerned, is a growing population. In Soviet Russia a need like that would be met by establishment of slave-labor camps, as has been done across the Bering Straits in Siberia. That will never be our way. But in the interest of our national security we should neglect no measure that will persuade enterprising citizens in suitable numbers to settle in Alaska and take their part in development of industry, agriculture, transportation, and other facilities there. The granting of statehood to Alaska, I am certain, will stimulate the growth of population, will promote the utilization of resources, and will strengthen the national defense.

On these grounds, as well as on those outlined earlier in this statement, I advocate passage of the Alaska statehood bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank the Senator from New York very much for granting me this courtesy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] to proceed to consideration of the Alaska statehood bill.

Mr. STENNIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hayden	McKellar
Byrd	Hendrickson	McMahon
Capehart	Holland	Magnuson
Carlson	Johnson, Tex.	Maybank
Cordon	Johnston, S. C.	O'Mahoney
Donnell	Kerr	Russell
Dworshak	Kilgore	Smith, N. C.
Ecton	Lehman	Stennis
Ferguson	Lucas	Taft
Frear	McClellan	Wherry
George	McFarland	Wiley

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present. The clerk will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Chief Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. FLANDERS, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. NEELY, Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, and Mr. YOUNG answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After a little delay Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. WATKINS, Mr. BREWSTER, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. GURNEY, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. IVES, Mr. BRICKER, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. CAIN, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. CLEMENTS, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GILLETTE, Mr. GREEN, Mr. HILL, Mr. HOEY, Mr. HUNT, Mr. KEM, Mr. LANGER, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. MALONE, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. MILLIKIN, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MYERS, Mr. O'CONOR, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mrs. SMITH of Maine, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. THYE, Mr. TOBEY, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. WILLIAMS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—PROPOSED UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am about to propound to the Senate a request for a unanimous-consent agreement. Before doing so, I should like to take a moment or two to discuss the pending question, namely, the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill granting statehood to Alaska.

I merely refer to the letter which was addressed to the Vice President of the United States on November 27 by the President of the United States. Everyone is familiar with that message, which is to be found on page 15772 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Without reading the entire message again, I merely refer to the last paragraph, reading as follows:

> For these reasons, I urge that the Senate give the highest priority to the statehood measures before it and complete legislative action on them before the present Congress adjourns.

For that reason, Mr. President, on November 27, shortly after the Senate convened, the majority leader moved the immediate consideration of the Alaska statehood bill.

In view of the days of debate which have continued since that time, it is quite apparent that there will not be a vote on the statehood bills. In other words, it is impossible to obtain a unanimous-consent agreement on the part of the Senate even for the Senate to vote on the motion to consider the bill providing for statehood for Alaska.

There cannot be any question in my mind but that the statehood bill is far more important than the railway labor bill which the Senate had under consideration when Congress adjourned in September. However, some Members of the Senate believe they are obligated to do all they can to have the Senate go through with the railway labor bill, in view of the fact that they made certain promises to leaders of various labor organizations who are interested in that measure. Before the adjournment was taken in September, those Senators promised certain labor leaders that they would do all they could to have the Senate proceed with the consideration of the railway labor bill upon the return of the Senate in November.

However, in view of the very earnest message from the President of the United States and in view of the fact that he asked that the statehood bills be considered on the highest priority list, when the session resumed I immediately moved, on Monday last, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Alaska statehood bill.

Mr. President, after making those brief remarks, I now desire to propound a unanimous-consent request dealing directly with the railway labor bill. I now ask unanimous consent that on the calendar day of December 4, 1950, at the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or motion which may be pending or which may be made to Senate bill 3295, a bill to amend the Railway Labor Act and to authorize agreements providing for union membership and agreements for deductions from the wages of carriers' employees for certain purposes under certain conditions, and upon the final passage of said bill; provided, that commencing at the hour of 2 o'clock, on December 4, the time between 2 o'clock and 4 o'clock shall be divided equally between the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]; provided further, that no amendment not germane to the subject matter of said bill shall be considered or received; and provided further, that after said hour of 4 o'clock, on December 4, debate upon any amendment or motion shall be limited to 5 minutes on the part of the author thereof and 5 minutes by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object—although I do not intend to object—let me say that I conferred with the majority leader, and I stated that the hour of 4 o'clock would be acceptable, so far as I knew, to Senators on this side of the aisle. Since that time I have conferred with a Senator who is absent at the moment, but who is interested in offering an amendment. That Member cannot return until Monday. I wonder whether there would be any objection if the distinguished majority leader would modify the proposed agreement so as to provide for the vote to be taken at 5 o'clock, and then let the time between 2 and 5 o'clock be equally divided. That would give that Senator ample time to present his amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be glad to comply with that request, and I modify the unanimous-consent request accordingly. The result will be to divide the time between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me ask the Senator to wait a moment, please; I believe we are developing a little difficulty in regard to the proposal, and I should like the Senator to wait long enough to permit me to make a further observation.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall wait until the Senator from Nebraska concludes his conference with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I am in a very accommodating mood.

Mr. WHERRY. It seems that other Members of the Senate are very much interested in having the vote taken at an earlier hour. Therefore, if it is agreeable to all other Members of the Senate, suppose we let the proposal remain for the vote to be taken at 4 o'clock.

Mr. LUCAS. Then, Mr. President, I return to my original proposal.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that the Senator from Illinois knows that I am very anxious to have action taken on the railway labor bill, and I am very anxious to see the Senate pass the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. I had the Senator from Alabama in mind when I propounded the request.

Mr. HILL. The agreement would end debate on all amendments, and it makes provision as to amendments which are germane.

There is an amendment which I understand is to be offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER]. I have not had an opportunity to consider that amendment, but certainly there has been no ruling on its germaneness. I am sure the Senator would not want to get himself into a position where that amendment would be in order, with no debate to be had upon it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator from Alabama refer to an amendment which has not yet been offered to the bill? Has not the Jenner amendment already been offered? If it has not been offered, then let us recall that in the unanimous-consent proposal the distinguished majority leader has provided that unless an amendment is germane, it shall not be offered or received. Is not that so?

Mr. LUCAS. I think the proposed agreement covers that, as follows:

Provided further, That no amendment not germane to the subject matter of said bill shall be considered or received.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, as the Senator from Nebraska knows, the Jenner amendment is what has commonly been referred to as the FEPC amendment. Anxious as we are to obtain action on this bill, yet I do not think we can rest until we know that that amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The proposed agreement provides that the Senate vote on the bill and on all amendments thereto. I am trying to protect the rights of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER], who is the Senator about whom I spoke, relative to offering the amendment. I am perfectly willing to have the agreement provide that the vote be taken at 4 o'clock. I am not sure that the Senator from Indiana can even return here by that time, but I should like to protect his rights.

I am glad the Senator from Alabama raised the question he did raise, because I certainly feel that the Senator from Indiana should have a right to offer the amendment. If it is not acceptable, it can be voted down.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I wish to assure the Senator from Alabama and all other Senators who are interested in the amendment of the Senator from Indiana that, regardless of whether it is or is not germane—and personally I do not believe it is germane; I do not believe it has any business being attached to this bill—if the amendment is offered and if it is considered, upon the making of a motion to table the amendment, I shall vote to table the amendment. I do not know whether that assurance is sufficient satisfaction to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that I am glad to hear the distinguished majority leader say that about the amendment. However, it is now nearly 5 o'clock. I wonder whether the Senator will withhold his request until the Senate convenes tomorrow at 12 o'clock, so that we may have a better opportunity to consider the amendment and to see what may be its effect, and particularly to determine whether the amendment might be germane or might be nongermane.

Mr. MAYBANK and Mr. WHERRY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield first to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, the Banking and Currency Committee has worked hard and long. We have the rent control bill ready, and we have asked the Printing Office to have copies of the testimony available to the Senate on Monday. I think it very unwise to bring up a very controversial issue pertaining to civil rights in connection with a railroad bill.

I am in agreement with the request of the Senator from Alabama that unanimous consent be granted to vote on the railway labor bill on Monday.

I should like to propose to the Senator from Illinois, if he will permit me to do so, that the Senate take up the rent control bill on Monday. I shall object to consideration of the railway labor bill until I distinctly understand that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] will withdraw his amendment relating to FEPC. Therefore, Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I am going to object to any unanimous-consent agreement in regard to a vote on anything having to do with FEPC. For years I have fought in the Senate for constitutional government. I know that the railway workers of the United States, with whom I am in sympathy, would never want me to agree, in connection with a unanimous-consent proposal, to have the Senate vote for something of that sort.

I realize that the distinguished majority leader will vote against it, but I do not know how other Senators will vote. Therefore, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to address a parliamentary inquiry to the occupant of the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Do the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement which has been propounded by the distinguished majority leader bar consideration of an amendment which has been discussed here, and which involves FEPC? Would that amendment be germane or would it not be germane, if it were offered, under the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the majority leader?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will say to the distinguished minority leader that it is not in order to request a ruling from the Chair upon a parliamentary situation which has not developed. The Chair could not make such a ruling until the amendment was offered.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show, then, that the minority leader is not objecting in any way to the unanimous-consent request. In fact, I am in favor of it, except that, on amendments, I want an understanding that any Senator who feels he has a right to offer an amendment shall be permitted to do so before the hour of 4 o'clock, or at any time after 4 o'clock, under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I shall be willing to withdraw my objection, if the Senate will unanimously agree at this time not to accept any amendment to the railroad bill having to do with FEPC. I ask unanimous consent for such an agreement, because I do not know who will occupy the chair when the question arises. As the Presiding Officer says, it is impossible to rule on a parliamentary question until it is developed. Only then can the occupant of the chair rule upon it. But if the Senate will give unanimous consent at this time not to accept any amendment relative to FEPC, I shall be willing to withdraw my objection.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. HILL, and Mr. KERR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment. The Chair understands that the Senator from South Carolina has made a unanimous-consent request that no FEPC amendment which may be offered will be regarded as germane.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Presiding Officer is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that this particular amendment has been submitted by a Republican colleague of mine who is not present, and who, I think, should have a right to be heard on whether he thinks it is in fact germane, I think it most unfair to proceed this afternoon to rule out his amendment by a unanimous-consent agreement, and I therefore object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah and Mr. WHERRY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that the FEPC bill is one which was reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The bill which is the subject of the unanimous-consent request also came from that committee. As chairman of the committee and as one of the sponsors of the FEPC bill, I should like to say that I shall vote against an FEPC amendment, if offered as an amendment to this bill, and I think every other member of my committee will also vote against the amendment if offered to the bill. I hope the unanimous-consent request will be granted, and that we may proceed with the bill. If we do that, I am sure we can control the votes in such a way that such an amendment, if offered, will not be agreed to. If the request is granted, we shall have a vote on the bill. I do not know what further assurance can be given than that.

Mr. CHAVEZ and Mr. MAYBANK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield first to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I merely want to say that no one has a higher regard and esteem for the distinguished Senator from Utah than myself, but I do not know who is going to be here when the amendment is to be brought up, and I do not know who is going to occupy the chair at that time. I intend to object to a vote on any measure which has anything to do with FEPC or which has anything to do with unconstitutional and un-American government.

Mr. CHAVEZ and Mr. WHERRY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I think we should clear the atmosphere as between the statement made by the Senator from Utah and what my good friend from South Carolina has in mind. I feel, as does the Senator from Utah, that I must object to any FEPC amendment being attached to this particular bill, but I was merely wondering, if my friend from Utah will give me his attention for a moment, whether the Senator from Utah objects to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana applying to the pending measure only, and not to any other bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Since the question has been asked, it seems to me that the FEPC amendment is not germane to the bill, and that is the way I would consider it if I were confronted with defending the bill on the floor.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The point I wish to make clear is that according to my understanding the Senator would object to an FEPC amendment, whether it applied to a general bill or whether it applied to the pending measure only.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I should object under either of those circumstances.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I also would object.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to say I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] that this particular amendment is not germane to the railroad bill, but, as individual Senators, it is not our prerogative to rule on that question. There should be an official ruling in regard to it. In my view it is a mistake to offer such an amendment to this bill. However, a colleague in this body has a right to offer such an amendment and to have an official ruling on it. It has been offered, and I think it would be a great mistake for us to follow the policy, by unanimous consent, of ruling out, in effect, a colleague's amendment. If he in good conscience and good faith believes that it is germane and wants to offer it as a part of this bill, I think he should have an opportunity to offer it, and we should then have an official ruling, which will at least have value as a precedent in the future. That is the only reason for my raising the objection to the unanimous-consent request offered by the the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK]. I merely think we must protect each other in matters of procedure in the Senate. I should feel very much better about it if we could at least delay this matter until our minority leader can get in touch with the Senator from Indiana and find out his wishes in regard to it. We may be able to get assurance from the Senator from Indiana that he does not intend to press his amendment; but he has offered it, it is on the table, and therefore I am not in favor of taking away, by unanimous consent, in his absence, what I think is a very important procedural right of his.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have been around here quite a while, and I have observed that the Senator from Nebraska is usually pretty alert about these things. He was not on his feet objecting a moment ago to the request made by the Senator from South Carolina, and I assumed that he probably had had a conversation with the Senator from Indiana. Perhaps he can clarify the situation.

Mr. WHERRY. I have had a conversation with the Senator's office. The only reason I was not on my feet more quickly was that the Senator from Oregon got the floor ahead of me, and objected to the request. What I should like to have done is, I think, impossible. I requested an interpretation as to the germaneness of this proposal. I can understand that that question cannot now be determined. If the question were raised, it would finally have to be settled by the Senate, anyway. So, in keeping with the remarks of the Senator from Oregon, I think all that is left for us now to do is to protect the rights of the Senator from Indiana. I regret very much that there is no way for us to arrive at a decision, unless Senators want to consider the Jenner amendment as having been already submitted, and to have it considered as one of the amendments offered before 4 o'clock. I do not think there is anything else that can be done.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, we have been here now practically all week, and we have had nothing before us but civil rights. We have had the civil-rights issue injected into the discussions of the statehood bills for Hawaii and Alaska.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. No; I do not yield, if the Senator please. I have yielded to Senators for about an hour, and I should like to say but one word. We now have the civil-rights question raised in connection with the railroad bill. I am fearful of taking up the rent-control bill, lest someone will seek to attach to it the FEPC bill, the poll-tax bill, or some other bill; in which case we shall again have the civil-rights question before us.

Mr. President, in all seriousness, it seems to me the time is coming when practically every bill that comes along, to which someone is objecting, will be made the occasion of some Senator seeking to attach the FEPC or the poll tax or some other bill involving the civil-rights issue. I should not like to see that happen. I probably shall not see it myself, because I shall soon be out of this Chamber. However, it seems to me that that is exactly what we are coming to. In other words, when we are trying to get a vote, for instance, upon statehood for Alaska, we are confronted with a filibuster, because it involves the question of civil rights. In the case of the railroad bill, we have the same situation. An effort is made to attach an FEPC amendment to it, a filibuster results, and we cannot reach a vote on that bill. I do not know where this kind of procedure is going to lead, but it seems to me to present a question of some seriousness so far as attempting to expedite the business of the Senate of the United States is concerned. I merely make that observation in passing. The Senator from Ohio had a conference when he returned to Washington, at which he said that about all we were going to do, he thought, was to meet and adjourn; and I am not so sure, as a result of this situation, but that he may be right.

Now we return to the railway labor bill. We have tried to get a unanimous-consent agreement. I do not think we can get one so long as an effort is made to attach an FEPC amendment to the bill until those who are vitally interested in civil rights legislation—and I believe they are rightly so interested—can find out whether they can defeat the motion. Until such time we shall be unable to get a vote on the bill. Under those circumstances, we could sit for a month without getting a vote on the bill. We could not get a vote until Senators who are interested in civil rights legislation know where they stand. That is the situation, Mr. President.

The Senator from Indiana offers an FEPC bill as an amendment to the railway labor bill. I do not know whether such an amendment would be germane. Perhaps it is. I do not know. It would concern labor, of course, but I do not know whether it would be considered germane. I do not believe it is proper to offer such a bill as an amendment to the Railway Labor Act, and I would vote against it, even though I have fought for FEPC legislation.

Mr. President, I should like to get along with the business of the Senate. I should like to have something accomplished during this short session. The Senator from South Carolina has a rent control bill to present. I hope we can pass such a bill on Monday. We cannot debate it before Monday. Probably we shall be able to take it up on Monday, instead of taking up the railway bill. I hope no Senator will try to defeat it by seeking to attach an FEPC amendment to it, although I am not certain that that will not be done before we get through with the rent control bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, what is the pending question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] to proceed to a consideration of the Alaska statehood bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to have the RECORD show that objection was made to the original unanimous-consent request which I made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced that objection was heard.

Mr. LUCAS. That was my recollection. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] said he was not certain that the Chair had made such announcement.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I did not hear the last statement of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I want the RECORD to show that objection was made to my original request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that he announced that objection was heard. Thereafter another unanimous-consent request was made, to which objection also was heard.

Mr. LUCAS. That is the way I understood the situation, but the Senator from Wyoming was not certain that the Chair had made the announcement.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, a moment ago the distinguished majority leader made reference to the fact that the civil-rights question had come up twice already during this special session. He recited two occasions on which that question had apparently intervened. Of course, the Senator knows that not only the Senator from Florida but other Senators who attach considerable importance to defeating certain portions of the so-called civil-rights program do not take the position that such program is involved in the question of Alaska statehood. At this time the Senator from Florida wishes to invite the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the fact that not only on the two occasions to which he has referred has the civil-rights question come up in debate during this special session, but there was a third occasion also on which it came into the discussion on the floor of the Senate, which perhaps the Senator from Illinois has failed to note.

The third occasion was my incorporation in the RECORD yesterday afternoon of the distinguished speech of the Honorable James A. Farley, which he delivered a few days ago at Tampa before the Florida State Chamber of Commerce, in which he found occasion to clearly state that in his judgment the civil-rights question was being rapidly solved in a peaceful and understanding way in the South. He said:

> To threaten the South with drastic Federal legislation is the last way to approach these problems. And we are a long way now from that last way.

I continue to quote from Mr. Farley's speech, which I had hoped the Senator from Illinois would have noted yesterday and might even have discussed with the President of the United States:

> The President might well in the interest of national as well as party unity summon the leaders of the South to solve these problems on a regional and a State basis. To pass a law, especially a Federal law, is never the best way to correct an injustice. Free men in whose hearts there lives a sense of justice and common sense can generally be trusted to do what is right.

I had strongly hoped that the Senator from Illinois had noted this third discussion of the important civil rights question. If he has not so noted it, I hope he will read the remarkable analytical and very wise address of that distinguished American, James A. Farley, on the occassion just mentioned, as incorporated in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Florida has given me some advice as to what I should do. I suggest that he and Mr. Farley go to the President of the United States and present that thought to the President.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from Illinois for his suggestion, but I understood that he had frequent conferences with the President of the United States on the matter of the legislative program, and I had hoped that he would discuss this subject with the President.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY (REPT. NO. 2585)

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I have before me a prepared address on the rent control resolution. It would take me 2 hours to deliver it. It contains a review of some speeches I delivered previously on the same subject. I shall not deliver it this evening. The address has been given to the press because I understood the subject was to be brought up today. Of course, if we are to stay in session, I shall be glad to stay as long as it is necessary. I shall be glad to stay until 11 o'clock, if necessary. However, the address, which I have already given to the press, will not be made until tomorrow. I ask unanimous consent to report an original resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 207, which was approved by the committee by a vote of 10 to 2. It would continue rent control under State direction and municipal control during January and February 1951. Thus the new Congress would be afforded an opportunity to write a proper defense rent control law. I submit a report on the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, was placed on the calendar.

SENATOR FROM FLORIDA

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, at this time I desire to file with the Senate a certificate signed by the Honorable R. A. Gray, secretary of state of Florida, certifying that the Honorable GEORGE A. SMATHERS was elected United States Senator at the general election held in Florida on the 7th day of November 1950, for the 6-year term beginning next January 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The credentials will be received, read, and placed on file.

The credentials were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

> STATE OF FLORIDA,
> OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.
> I, R. A. Gray, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that GEORGE A. SMATHERS at the general election held on the 7th day of November A. D. 1950 was elected United States Senator, having received the highest number of votes for said office at said election.
> The whole number of votes cast for said office at said election was 313,215, of which GEORGE A. SMATHERS received 238,987 votes, John P. Booth received 74,228 votes, as shown by the election returns on file in this office.
> Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 21st day of November A. D. 1950.
> [SEAL] R. A. GRAY,
> Secretary of State.

STATEHOOD FOR HAWAII

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD the following radiogram which was received today by JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON, Delegate to Congress from Hawaii:

> Wednesday's casualty list reports four more Hawaii soldiers killed in Korea, five wounded, one of these for second time, and five missing. Brings total to 77 killed, 284 wounded, 82 missing, 2 prisoners of war.

This brings the total casualties from Hawaii to 445. At this rate, of approximately 1 per 1,000 population, the casualties for the United States as a whole would be 150,000.

Mr. President, I also desire to insert in the RECORD at this point a cablegram which I received this afternoon from the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], from Honolulu.

There being no objection, the radiogram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> HONOLULU, November 29, 1950.
> Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
> Senate Office Building,
> Washington, D. C.:
> Wish to advise you of following statement concerning admission of Hawaii and authorize you to use statement in any way which will be helpful and also to pair me in every way possible in aid of your efforts to gain admission for Hawaii and Alaska. Return not later than Monday.

Statement follows:

"The new Korean crisis makes statehood for Hawaii and Alaska important now as never before, in the interest of a strong American defense. In this crucial moment all lesser things must be forgotten and the immeasurable capacity of these two great and proven patriotic American communities must be made a part of the central core of our great Nation. Only as States can we really develop these two areas to the point where they will be the strongest possible bulwarks of our Nation. We must show the other peoples of the world that we make character, not color the criterion of quality in America. Hawaii's people have shown magnificent loyalty to the United States. I have seen in the hospitals of Japan and Korea many an Hawaiian soldier who bared himself to the enemy and has been wounded in defense of our cause."

CLAUDE PEPPER.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. LUCAS to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to read into the RECORD for the information of the Members of the Senate a portion of the caption of the bill (S. 2036), to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union. It is the companion bill on Alaska statehood, which was introduced in the Senate. It was introduced on June 10 (legislative day, June 2), 1949, by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], for himself, and on behalf of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Graham, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the former Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Baldwin, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY].

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. FERGUSON obtained the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask the distinguished acting majority leader, what are the plans for the proceedings after the Senator from Michigan has completed his remarks?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The RECORD has been made perfectly clear today by the objections which were made to various unanimous-consent agreements that there is nothing to be gained by a prolonged session, and when the Senator from Michigan has completed his remarks it will be my purpose, if I am here, to ask that the Senate recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. WHERRY. Will it be tomorrow, or Monday?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It will be tomorrow.

THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION—BOOK BY MAX LOWENTHAL

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, reserving the right to return at a later date to a more extended treatment of the subject, I should like to make a brief statement about a book released to the public on November 20. The book is entitled "The Federal Bureau of Investigation"; the author is a lawyer and former Government employee named Max Lowenthal; the publishers are the William Sloane Associates, Inc., of New York City. I need not further identify the book, the author, or the publishers. Every Member of Congress was presented with a copy by the publishers.

Mr. President, this book is evil, and it is symtomatic of an internal threat to our security. Never in our history has the United States been in a more critical position than it is today. The Communist menace threatens the entire world, and we are even now fighting for our lives in Asia. We cannot tell the day or moment when this fight for life may come even nearer. This menace operates not only abroad; it operates here at home also.

Mr. President, in the last extremity, when no man can hope to defend himself alone, the community closes ranks to preserve itself. Most of the time we take our Nation and society for granted, but every man knows in his heart that at the last we have to join together to save our lives. This has been so with all nations from the beginning of time, and that is why the greatest of all crimes is treason. The man who betrays his country to the enemy, betrays his neighbors, and his neighbors know it.

Mr. President, our position in the world is peculiar. The dynamic of our economy is supplied by private enterprise. Our Government is a representative republic, based upon a written Constitution. In that Constitution is a Bill of Rights, which contains the sacred promises of trial by jury, of protection of free speech and press and of religious establishments, the right of petition, and so on. The fathers who wrote this Constitution were not so simple-minded as not to know that the responsibility of maintaining these rights rested upon the citizens and their Government. It is the fact that intermittently through all our history these rights have had to be struggled and fought for; it has often required strenuous effort to maintain them. Yet, despite grievous lapses, we have managed by and large to keep the rights intact, and have had the envy of mankind .

Thirty-three years ago a band of extremely able and ruthless conspirators seized control of Russia, then in the throes of collapse, and set up the Soviet Union. From that hour Moscow became the capital of a world-wide conspiracy having, as its aim, the conquest of the world and the establishment of communism throughout the globe.

We all know that communism itself is imperialism, that it is going to establish itself in all parts of the world by force unless it is prevented by force from doing so. That applies to other countries, as well as to the United States.

In the prosecution of this conspiracy the Communists speedily discovered that the rights of freedom of speech and press, so long fought for in the west, could be utilized in pushing Communist designs. Thus, by degrees, every country discovered within its borders a conspiratorial group, looking to Moscow for direction, and obediently following the dictates of this foreign power.

On many occasions Communists use as a shield the Constitution of the United States, and I for one believe they have a right to do that under our law, but they also owe obedience to the law.

How to handle this problem presented difficulties which no government had ever faced before. The Congress was slow to grapple with the problem because of the dread in every man's heart that inadvertently some portion of the Bill of Rights would be jeopardized.

But all this while it was clear enough to everybody that whatever Congress might do in the way of legislation, the Communists must be watched and information of their activities gathered.

Last Friday we read in the press that the Communists said they must have mass action, that they could no longer abide by boards set up by Government, by Congress, or by the courts. That was said in connection with the 1950 security law. The task of watching the Communists developed, under the statutes, upon the Federal Bureau of Investigation, with the chief responsibility resting upon its director. Since 1924 the director has been Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, who was appointed to the place by Attorney General Stone, later Chief Justice of the United States. Mr. Stone, when he made the appointment, was disturbed about expenses of the Bureau during the so-called Palmer raids in 1919 and 1920. He wanted the Bureau of Investigation overhauled, its method of personnel selection made more careful and severe, its morale heightened. Mr. Hoover was given the job of doing this, and has held the position ever since. He has done this while simultaneously carrying out the duties imposed upon him by the statutes.

In line of duty the FBI, among other things, has been watching the Communists for years. Of course, we all know that the FBI has no power to act upon the information which it gathers. It can only act upon the express orders of the Attorney General and the Department of Justice.

I have stated upon the floor of the Senate previously that in 22 cases the FBI was prevented from acting except upon the express orders of the Department of Justice, that is, a Cabinet officer of the President of the United States.

That Mr. Hoover is conscious of the peculiar responsibility resting upon him we know; he has discussed it in public many times. I recall his statement at the annual meeting of the International Association of Chiefs of Police in 1945. He then said:

I have said before, and I say again, that there is no place in our American way of life for a national police. Our first line of defense in peace or war is the local police agency. It is on the scene and can strike at lawlessness at its source.

Now comes Mr. Lowenthal with his book about the FBI. It is manifestly the product of long and ingenious labor, with hundreds of citations and pieces of quoted matter, carefully and deceptively fitted together to form a tremendous indictment of the FBI. So lengthy, indeed, is the book and so elaborate its design that I shall not attempt at this point to analyze it. It would require a floor address of several hours and an equally lengthy list of citations. For the moment I wish only to point out the burden of the Lowenthal argument. By implication Mr. Lowenthal seeks to do two things:

First. To make Mr. Hoover responsible for the excesses of the Bureau before Mr. Hoover became the Director.

Second. To persuade people that the FBI is potentially a tyrannical secret police which would wreck our civil liberties and subject our citizens to the ruthless practices of the police state.

One of the best descriptions of the Lowenthal book I have seen is found in a review published in the Washington Post for November 26, 1950. The review is by Father Edwin Walsh of Georgetown University, a student of communism for 30 years. Says Father Walsh:

> What the author has produced is a lawyer's indictment of the FBI in the style and mood of a prosecuting attorney * * * he selects his material with an eye to getting a conviction.

But the book is even more than that. It is the work of an obviously practiced slicker. Never does Mr. Lowenthal make a categorical statement which would leave his defenses open; he spreads his poison by implication and indirection. For a man who represents himself to be so concerned about the state of our civil liberties, who has such a passionate yearning for the FBI to be honest and above board, it is remarkable that he is willing to sign his name to an indictment so devious.

If what Mr. Lowenthal implies were true, the author would not be at large this moment. The FBI would hold him incommunicado in some secret place of incarceration. Mr. Lowenthal's publishers would be in a prison camp, and the G-men would right now be installed in Sloane Associates offices in New York, browbeating stenographers and applying thumbscrews to the editorial employees. None of these things are true. The book is on sale openly everywhere, the publishers are getting their money and, presumably, are paying Mr. Lowenthal his royalties.

What is true, however, is that Mr. Lowenthal has committed a devilish piece of sabotage, sabotage of the mind. While assailing the idea of thought control he is perverting thought itself. The book is not honest, it is not above board, but it is persuasive. The pseudo-liberal who has access to print and radio may very well be taken in by the book and help to spread the poison.

Since he retired twenty-odd years ago a comparatively wealthy man Mr. Lowenthal has had plenty of time to devote to extracurricular activity such as his constant and ever-increasing tirades against the FBI. In the early 1940's he circulated a 75-page memorandum around the National Press Club urging writers to go after the FBI. Portions of this memorandum were used verbatim in the editorial columns of the New Masses, Daily Worker, the New Republic and other publications. In 1941 he wrote another memorandum entitled "Is the Department of Justice Sufficiently Competent in National Defense?" in which he attacked the Hobbs bill legalizing wiretapping. The same year he produced another paper called "Shall America Have a Permanent Large Scale Political Spy System?" In this piece he attacked Mr. Hoover as a man attempting to undermine civil liberties through association with the military, and as the one person directly responsible for the Palmer Red raids in 1919 and 1920.

This book is advertised as an objective study. But that is something of the background of bias against which this book was written.

Mr. President, if we had had no experience with Communist infiltration, if we did not know from the Wadleigh confessions, the Marzani and the Coplon convictions, from the Hiss case, and numerous others how far the Communist infiltration of Government had gone, if we did not have the documentary evidence of subversion and sabotage now being printed in the daily press we might be less suspicious of this book.

But we do know about this infiltration. Our eyes are opened to the desperate character of the situation in which we find ourselves. We know of the clear and present danger in which we are.

One of the most successful tactics of the Communist technique has been to destroy character and to undermine institutions. And this book is designed to do both—to destroy the character of a fine administrator, Mr. Hoover, and the character of a well organized and just institution, guarding the freedom and liberties of our people, the FBI.

Two months ago, after labor covering a period of 5 years, Congress passed the McCarran Act. The first part of that act was originally known as the Mundt-Ferguson bill. When it was first presented to the House it was the Mundt-Nixon bill. It had been altered in the Senate, and therefore the change of names applying to it.

The purpose of the act is to give Government the means and the power to grapple more effectively with the Communist threat. Under this act the responsibilities of the FBI are greatly increased. Mr. Hoover's tasks are now more onerous than ever. Almost at the moment when these tasks are given him, the Lowenthal book appears. At bottom the book is evil, a monstrous libel, designed to blast the reputation of the man upon whom Congress has just laid new burdens. In all conscience, Congress cannot allow this libel to pass unchallenged. So long as our people remain free and our institutions remain strong books like this will be known for what they are and properly discounted by the American people.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator from Michigan and I are members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which deals with FBI appropriations. We have sat together on that subcommittee for several years. We have noticed how carefully the subcommittee and the full committee go into the requests for expenditures by the FBI. In the opinion of the Senator from Michigan would it not be impossible for the FBI to become a secret police, to become a Gestapo, while Members of Congress were on the job at all?

Mr. FERGUSON. I agree heartily with that suggestion. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will agree with the Senator from Michigan that on many occasions the Director of the FBI, Mr. Hoover, has said to the committee that the purpose of the FBI was not to ferret out matters that had no connection with Federal law; that the Bureau was a gatherer of facts and information so that proper prosecution could be had, but only in connection with matters involving Federal statutes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it not also true that the Members of Congress who have to be elected, would be the first recipients of any complaints by constituents if they felt that such a thing as a Gestapo were impending?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I agree. Not only the members of the Appropriations Committee, but every Member of Congress would be here and would be able to act, and it would be impossible for the FBI to function as a Gestapo, because the FBI, in its functioning, depends upon the appropriations made by Congress. The appropriations must be made every year.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. It is equally true, is it not, that Mr. Hoover, when he presents his case, presents it in such a factual way that he has gained perhaps greater respect than any of the department heads who come before the Congress asking for appropriations?

Mr. FERGUSON. I would say so; and I would say further that in practically every case his explanations have been such as to cause the committee, and later the Congress, to be willing to approve the appropriations he has requested.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As a final question; does not the Senator agree that, inasmuch as the burden is upon Congress, to appropriate the money, it is impossible for what Mr. Lowenthal suggests to become a reality?

Mr. FERGUSON. I believe so. I have no fear, because I believe that Congress, being in control of the purse strings, will be able to cope with any situation. The matters which seem to have been used in this book to cause this insidious thinking about the FBI, an organization which is now so vital to our great country, have not been called to the attention of the Congress.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. I move the Senate now stand in recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, December 1, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Dr. Bob Jones, Jr., president of the Bob Jones University, Greenville, S. C., offered the following prayer:

God of nations and of men, in this hour of crisis we intercede for our country and for these men who shape her laws. Make our leaders strong of stature to wear worthily the mantle of their responsibilities. Give them that zeal without which work is but drudgery and that capacity for work without which zeal is but hysteria.

May they have eyes that see truth, hearts that love truth, lips that speak truth, and courage to contend for truth, remembering that He who declared that truth shall make men free, said of Himself, "I am the truth."

All our wisdom is foolishness to Thee; all human strength, weakness before Thee. Grant this Congress, therefore, divine wisdom from above and make these United States a nation "Strong in the Lord and the power of His might."

To this end, forgive America her pride, her backslidings, her sins. Lay upon our people a burden of repentance and heart-searching. Pour out upon the length and breadth of our needy land showers of spiritual revival and may those showers fall even upon the hearts assembled here. We pray through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, November 27, 1950, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution (S. Res. 364):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HERBERT A. MEYER, late a Representative from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. LANGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 51–8.

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation, which was read by the Clerk:

NOVEMBER 28, 1950.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
The Capitol, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have this day transmitted to the Governor of California my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the Twelfth District of California, effective midnight November 30, 1950.

Respectfully yours,

RICHARD NIXON.

NOTIFICATION OF ELECTION OF MR. WOODROW W. JONES AS A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read by the Clerk:

NOVEMBER 29, 1950.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: A certificate of election in due form of law, showing the election of the Honorable WOODROW W. JONES as a Representative to the Eighty-first Congress from the Eleventh Congressional District of North Carolina, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the Honorable Alfred L. Bulwinkle, is on file in this office.

Very truly yours,

RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

Mr. WOODROW W. JONES appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

AID TO YUGOSLAVIA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 723)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I recommend that the Congress enact legislation authorizing further United States assistance to meet the emergency created by the food shortage in Yugoslavia.

More than 2 years ago the Government of Yugoslavia broke its association with the Soviet Union and its satellites. This rift resulted primarily from the refusal of the Yugoslavs to agree to the dictation of the Kremlin in the affairs of Yugoslavia. The Yugoslavs are determined to maintain their independence of the Kremlin. They are maintaining the largest fighting force in Europe, outside of the Soviet Union.

The breach between Yugoslavia and the Kremlin and its satellites has steadily widened. The Kremlin is determined to wipe out this one successful example of a former satellite which has freed itself from Soviet control. Directly and through its satellites, the Kremlin is trying to destroy Yugoslav independence. Yugoslavia is being subjected to an economic blockade, to propaganda, subversion, military pressure, and harassing border raids.

Since the break between the Kremlin and Yugoslavia, it has been the policy of this Government to assist Yugoslavia to maintain its independence. The continued independence of Yugoslavia is of great importance to the security of the United States and its partners in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and to all nations associated with them in their common defense against the threat of Soviet aggression.

This past summer Yugoslavia suffered perhaps the worst drought in its history. There were severe crop failures, and the lack of feed and fodder led to the extensive slaughtering of livestock. As a result, Yugoslavia is threatened with famine this winter. This would provide fertile ground for the subversive activities of the Kremlin and would seriously undermine the capacity of the Yugoslav people to resist Soviet aggression.

On October 20, 1950, the Yugoslav Government formally requested United States assistance in averting the worst effects of the disastrous crop failure. This request came only after the Yugoslav Government had exhausted all means of meeting the situation by its own efforts.

Immediate action was necessary to meet the situation. Shipments had to be arranged at the earliest possible date. Otherwise, it would have been impossible to get food to the more remote areas of Yugoslavia before they were isolated by the heavy winter snows.

Accordingly, this Government has taken action to begin shipments under existing authority and with funds already available. The Economic Cooperation Administration has made arrangements for the shipment of flour from Italy and Germany directly to Yugoslavia. At the same time, with the concurrence of the North Atlantic Treaty countries, mutual defense assistance funds are being made available for procurement of food supplies equivalent to the immediate needs of the Yugoslav armed forces. In addition, the Export-Import Bank is permitting a portion of a previously negotiated Yugoslav loan to be used for the purchase and transport of foodstuffs, partly from American surplus stocks. Under present plans, the cost of this interim aid already under way will amount to about $30,000,000. This is sufficient only to meet a portion of the total need.

Now that the Congress has reconvened, I believe it appropriate to request a special authorization to meet the balance of the essential food needs of the Yugoslav people until the next harvest. Action should be taken promptly. Shipments of the remaining supplies needed must be started before the end of December, if the bulk of the food is to be available for distribution in the critical winter period. The additional aid needed is estimated at $38,000,000. This amount, plus the amount provided under existing authority, will only be sufficient to bring the Yugoslav diet up to a bare subsistence level.

We have received satisfactory assurances from the Yugoslav Government, first, that all assistance furnished by the United States will be given full and continuous publicity through the press and radio in Yugoslavia; second, that the aid will be distributed equitably and fairly among the Yugoslav people; and third, that this distribution will be under the observation of persons designated by the United States.

It is my earnest hope that the Congress will, at this session, provide the $38,000,000 necessary for shipments of food to Yugoslavia. In this way we can help preserve the independence of a nation which is defying the savage threats of the Soviet imperialists, and keeping Soviet power out of one of Europe's most strategic areas. This is clearly in our national interest.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 29, 1950.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute in order to inquire of the majority leader as to the program for next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, on Monday there will be a call of bills on the Consent Calendar. There will be no call of bills on the Private Calendar on Tuesday.

On Monday, H. R. 9184, the air-mail subsidy-separation bill, will come up for consideration.

There is no other program for the remainder of the week except, of course, if a tax bill is reported or any other legislation relating to the Yugoslav recommendation made by the President or rent control, those bills will be brought up as soon as possible. I understand that we are going to adjourn over until tomorrow in order that the tax bill might be introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. However, there will be no business tomorrow. We are simply going over in order that the bill might be introduced to expedite action by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HALLECK. Can the gentleman give us any further suggestion or idea as to the probability of having either the tax bill or possibly an extension of rent control for action next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. Can the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means tell us? Might I say to my friend from North Carolina that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana has made inquiry as to the probability of the tax bill coming up next week. Seeing you on the floor, I thought that you could give the best information to the gentleman from Indiana and to the Members of the House.

Mr. DOUGHTON. We expect to make arrangements to introduce the bill as soon as possible.

Mr. McCORMACK. Has the gentleman then any idea when the bill might be reported out?

Mr. DOUGHTON. As early as we can get permission from the Committee on Ways and Means. At the earliest date possible.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words, the gentleman expects that the tax bill will be brought up in the House next week?

Mr. DOUGHTON. We expect to.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think that gives the information.

Mr. HALLECK. I thank the gentleman.

EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means may have until midnight Saturday to file the report of the committee on a bill to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes, and that the same permission be granted with respect to any supplemental or minority views.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

THE LATE EDWIN M. SCHAEFER

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I announce to my colleagues in the House the death on last November 8 of the Honorable Edwin M. Schaefer, a former Member of the House, having served five terms from March 4, 1933, to January 3, 1943.

Ed Schaefer was not only a predecessor of mine from the old Twenty-second Illinois District, embracing Bond, Madison, Monroe, St. Clair, and Washington Counties, but I had the honor and privilege of serving as his secretary during the entire period of his service in Congress.

During the last 8 years of his 10 years in this body, Ed Schaefer served on the Military Affairs Committee. I know the contribution he made to his country in 1939 and 1940, in the days when it was not easy to secure enactment of defense legislation.

I recall most of all how, against doctor's orders, he left his sick bed in Belleville to return to Washington to help in the passage of the extension of the Selective Service Act. We remember how on August 12, 1941, that important legislation—with Pearl Harbor only 4 months away—passed this House by the mere margin of 1 vote, 203 to 202.

During his congressional career, Ed Schaefer was particularly interested in strengthening our national defense. It was his major interest as a Member of Congress. In those critical days in 1939 and 1940, before most Americans were awake to the danger that faced the Nation, he spent long hours and worked late into the night on vital defense legislation. He rendered a very patriotic service during that period of crisis.

Ed Schaefer served the people of his district, his State, and the Nation honestly and faithfully during his 10 years in Congress. No man was ever more sincere in his work. When he left official life on January 3, 1943, upon voluntary retirement because of failing health there was not a blemish upon his record of public service, beginning with his first public office as chief deputy recorder of deeds of St. Clair County in 1928, then county treasurer in 1930, and finally his long congressional service starting in 1933.

His efforts rehabilitated Scott Field, now Scott Air Force Base, saved it for the Belleville area in 1934, when consideration was being given to closing it, by having it designated by the then Secretary of War, George H. Dern, as a permanent installation. He was untiring in his efforts to make his district the center of air activity of the Military Establishment.

He was born May 14, 1887, at Belleville, in St. Clair County, where his family has resided for more than 100 years. He attended public schools of Belleville, graduated from Western Military Academy at Alton, attended University of Illinois for 2 years, and was graduated from Washington University, St. Louis, Mo., with the degree of chemical engineer.

As superintendent of plants for Morris & Co., 1918–28, he won the confidence of all his employees, particularly World War I veterans to whom he gave preference in employment as they returned to civilian life after the war.

I never knew a man who loved his home more than Ed Schaefer, nor a man who was blessed with a finer family. He is survived by his wife, Lorene Kohl Schaefer; two sons, Edwin M., Jr., and Martin W. Schaefer; three sisters and one brother.

He was a most gracious man in his attitude toward others. He was a very dutiful man. There was never a finer man than Edwin M. Schaefer. He was a great American.

COMMON ACTION AGAINST AGGRESSION

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, the threat to the general peace of the world and, indeed, to the very continuation of civilized life, which is posed by the war in Korea and now the participation in that war of forces of Communist China with the obvious backing of the Soviet Union, and the committing of various acts of aggression, make it essential that the United Nations without delay take steps to provide for the speedy mobilization and the unification of all of the military resources of its membership.

In view of the very pressing danger of our being involved in such a conflict at any moment, I am this day introducing a concurrent resolution to memorialize and request the United Nations to immediately mobilize, equip, and train the potential armed strength of its members and to equalize among these members the burden of providing for world security.

I think that a uniform selective military service plan for all members of the United Nations is in order, that the contribution of each nation be publicized, and that the determination of the United Nations to take such common action against aggression be advertised by every means.

Mr. Speaker, if we wish to be free we must accept the painful truth.

The concurrent resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the prospect, embodying the hopes of many nations, that peace and security in the world would be accomplished by the crushing of nazism and fascism in the course of World War II has been placed in great jeopardy by the aggressive action of North Koreans, instigated, aided, and abetted by other peoples of like disposition; and

Whereas the massed armed forces now maintained in eastern and southern Asia, in the Balkan Peninsula, and in Eastern Germany, together with the public assertions and avowed doctrines of representatives of totalitarian nations can only be regarded as an intent to rely on force as an instrument of national policy; and

Whereas the United Nations has been established as a means of maintaining international tranquillity and security by taking collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and for the suppression of acts of aggression and to bring about, in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, the settlement of situations likely to lead to breaches of the peace: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Assembly of the United Nations be memorialized and requested to take such steps or to enact such measures as will result in uniform selective military service regulations on a proportional population basis by those of its members pledged to preserve their lands and their liberties to the end that armed aggression can be inhibited and security preserved throughout the world by common collective action; and be it further

Resolved, That the contribution of each nation to the cause of freedom be publicized and that the determination of the United Nations to take common action against aggression in any quarter be made known and advertised by every means in order that it may be understood throughout the world that willful breaches of the peace will be opposed by the united action of free peoples and by overwhelming force.

THE LATE HONORABLE LOUIS LUDLOW

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS].

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, it is with a very heavy heart that I rise to inform the House that Louis Ludlow, who represented the Indianapolis district in this body for 20 years, passed away at George Washington Hospital in the city of Washington on Tuesday afternoon, November 28, 1950.

Preceding his congressional service, Mr. Ludlow was a member of the Press Gallery of Congress for 28 years. He was a former president of the National Press Club. In Congress, he served his district, his State, and his country with honor and distinction. Of him it could truthfully be said that if every person to whom he has done a kindness were to place a flower on his grave, his body would rest beneath a wilderness of red roses, his favorite flower.

He devoted his entire life to working for others. On the wall of his office hung the motto by which he lived: "Do all the good you can, in all the ways you can, to all the people you can, just as long as you can, and you will have always around you the arms that never fail."

He served without reference to race, rank, or creed. He never spared himself and as a consequence his health failed and he was obliged to endure a long, cruel illness.

He did not seek reelection to office, although it was conceded that he could have represented our district as long as he desired. I had the honor to succeed him. Wherever I went people told me of his kindnesses and good deeds. There is not a block in Indianapolis where he has not stretched a helping hand in time of need. And they all revere and love him. Every resident of our district, old or young, rich or poor, in high place or low, called him friend. A sweeter spirit never lived.

I feel a deep personal grief in his loss and extend my sincere condolence to his bereaved family.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, flags are hanging at half-mast in Indiana today—a tribute to one of her noblest sons. And although he is no longer officially a member of this body, he was still one of us, and our hearts go out to those who mourn for him.

Louis Ludlow loved the House and the House loved him. The greater part of his life was spent here in the Capitol. For two decades—a fifth of a century—he was a Member of the House, establishing the unique record of the longest continuous service in that capacity in Indiana history. He also held another record, to which he often referred, as the only man to move from a seat in the press gallery to a seat in the House. As an author, as a newspaperman and as a legislator, he was a national institution.

It was my privilege to know him intimately throughout his congressional career. He and I occupied offices just across the corridor from each other and I had the opportunity to consult him frequently. He was a man of rare tact and judgment and possessed an uncanny ability to judge and chart the growth and trend of public sentiment.

No doubt his talent in that respect was due to the fact that he kept close to the people. Although he was seldom out of Washington, he kept in constant touch with the people of his district through correspondence and while he had an especially efficient office staff, his own busy typewriter ran ceaselessly day and night. Many times when I left the office late at night I have stopped by for a brief good night word with him.

Second only to his devotion to his friends and his constituency was his indefatigable industry. He not only carried on a mountainous correspondence but he was exemplary in the discharge of his committee duties. He was always the first man at the table and regardless of how prosaic and irksome the character of the hearings, he remained until the last witness had been heard and dismissed. As I sat with him in the committee and the House I was often reminded of that ancient proverb from the wisdom of Solomon:

Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings.

That was literally true in the life of Louis Ludlow.

While he was one of the most matter-of-fact men in the world, his books frequently reveal a rare sense of humor. If any here by chance have not had the pleasure of reading his Senator Solomon Spifflcdink they have an enjoyable experience ahead of them. Incidentally, the most experienced politician cannot fail to find in that delightful book many allusions that will add to his knowledge of practical political strategy.

Louis Ludlow was a devoted husband and father. His wife, Mrs. Katherine Huber Ludlow, was a newspaper woman on the staff of the same newspaper at the time of their marriage, and was a help and inspiration through life. He was a man of deep religious conviction and an active member and a trustee of his church at the time of his death. As his pastor said of him this morning, he was a Christian gentleman, always a Christian and always a gentleman.

Quoting from his home paper received in Washington this morning:

As a man, Louis Ludlow lived by his beliefs, beliefs grounded in the Holy Bible and fashioned after the Gospel of Jesus. Perhaps some verses from the twenty-second chapter of the Book of Matthew, which he loved to quote, describe the life and the character of Louis Ludlow better than any other words could convey:

"Master, which is the great commandment in the law?

"Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

"This is the first and great commandment.

"And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

He was a noted author, a great journalist, a distinguished statesman, and a true humanitarian. His lifetime philosophy is best expressed by the lines from Sam Walter Foss read at the services this morning:

Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by.
The men who are good and the men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
I would not sit in the scorner's seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban,
Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
And be a friend to man.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and I also ask unanimous consent that all Members who wish to extend their remarks on the passing of our former colleague, Louis Ludlow, be permitted to do so at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress who had the good fortune to know and serve in this body with Louis Ludlow were greatly grieved to learn of his passing on.

Louie Ludlow was a native Hoosier who spent his adult life in the newspaper work and public service. He served in Congress from the Seventy-first until he retired at the end of the Eightieth Congress.

Previous to his service in Congress he was actively engaged in the newspaper field and enjoyed the honor of being the first newspaper man to be elevated to the Congress from the Press Gallery of the House of Representatives. Louie Ludlow was a reporter for the Indianapolis Sentinel way back in 1896, and reported political highlights from the celebrated presidential campaign of William McKinley and William Jennings Bryan of that year. In 1901 he came to Washington as a representative for various Indiana newspapers and remained as a newspaper correspondent in Washington until the time he was elected to Congress.

He was the author of a number of books and was highly accomplished in the art of writing, both as a newspaper correspondent and author. From a list of his more celebrated books, we have From Cornfield to Press Gallery, In the Heart of Hoosierland, Senator Solomon Spiffledink, America Go Bust, Hell or Heaven, and other lesser literary works.

He was also honored by Butler University, located in his home district, by having conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws.

Louis Ludlow was a thinker, a writer, an author, a logician, and a statesman. He was well informed on all subjects, especially those pertaining to his Government, and could discourse intelligently and entertainingly on any question of domestic policy or international concern. Throughout his whole career he was a real crusader for cases which he espoused. He was sincere and honest and a true friend to thousands who were fortunate enough to enjoy his acquaintance. He was courageous and had great ability to analyze legislative problems. He had served on many important committees, but his principal assignment was on the House Appropriations Committee, where he made a major contribution as chairman of the Treasury and Post Office Subcommittee.

On important issues he never sought the popular side nor chose the easy way. He was guided by a high sense of duty and valiantly fought toward the goal which he set for himself without regard to consequences involving his political fortunes or his future successes. He measured up to all the standards by which men determine greatness, and he loyally gave his service not only to his friends and his party, but, through his patriotic devotion to the welfare of his country, he won the high esteem and affection of all who were privileged to enter the charmed circle of his intimate friends.

Occasionally we hear people speak of others as not having an enemy in the world. That statement can truly be said of Louis Ludlow. His nature and personality were such that he never intentionally offended anybody. If he could not speak well of his fellowman, he remained silent. This human quality more than anything else solidified many friendships which remained binding throughout his lifetime.

His life was well lived and a model for good character. His congressional district, the State of Indiana, and the Nation have greatly benefited by his public service.

I wish to extend to his good wife, children, and relatives my sincere sympathy on the passing of a beloved husband, father, and great American.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, we Hoosiers are proud of our State. We are proud of our State for many reasons—many good reasons. One of those reasons is that we have had in our great State men and women of exceptional ability and talents. Indiana people have been known for their prominent positions among people of letters and people who are active in public life. Louie Ludlow, as we affectionately knew him, was one of those Hoosiers who has contributed so much to the prestige and position which Indianans hold. A man of humble beginnings, he made his mark in the field of letters as an author and as a newspaperman of exceptional ability. Then he became a Member of the Congress of the United States. To those of you who knew him and served with him it is not at all necessary for me to say that he made his mark here as a Member of this great body.

Those things may well be said in memory of Louie Ludlow. But at his funeral service today, which I attended, I heard his pastor say a thing which I believe to be the finest tribute that can be paid to any man. What he said in effect was that while we speak of Louie Ludlow's great capacity in letters and in newspaper work and in public life, we also knew him as a fine Christian gentleman, a Christian not by profession alone, but it was evidenced by everything that he ever said or did in his whole life.

Possibly his family, who mourn his passing with all the rest of us, and his host of friends, may be comforted in the sure knowledge that Louie Ludlow has so lived as to leave great imprint of friendship, helpfulness, integrity, loyalty, and honesty, and all those other fine attributes which make a man's life worthwhile. Because he lived that sort of a life, because he was that sort of a man, certainly all of us, while we shall mourn his passing, can take great comfort in the fact that he lived and walked among us.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with others who have spoken about the character and accomplishments of my dear friend, Louis Ludlow. When I first came to Congress nearly 26 years ago I had been reading the Ludlow articles about Washington in the Columbus Dispatch, which is one of the leading papers in Ohio. I was glad to become personally acquainted with him.

While the Members from Indiana have said nice things about him, I feel that I am speaking for thousands of Ohioans who remember him and the interesting and informative articles that he wrote to the Ohio papers for so long. Many Ohioans will join me in saying that he was not only a great Hoosier, but he was also a great Ohioan.

I had the pleasure of reading some of the books that he wrote, but somehow I feel that the finest thing that he ever wrote was his speech introducing Lindbergh when he appeared in Washington following his memorable flight across the ocean. That speech is truly a literary classic.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the passing of Louis Ludlow is a matter of deep regret to all who knew him. I agree with my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], that he was a true Christian gentleman, not only in word but in action. He was a man of deep faith, of sincere convictions, of strong loyalties. He made his contributions in various ways during his journey through life, and has left his imprint upon the pages of our history. As a legislator he was serious, devoted to his work, and served his people in a loyal way that gained their confidence in him for a long period of time. During the years he and I served together a close friendship developed between us. In his death I have sustained a personal loss. To Mrs. Ludlow and the other members of her family I join with the Indiana delegation and my colleagues in extending to them our profound sympathy.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I was very sorry to hear of the death of Louis Ludlow.

He was first elected to Congress in 1928. He soon came on the Appropriations Committee. It was my privilege to serve upon the same subcommittees with Louis for at least 15 years.

He was one of the hardest workers I have ever known. He was an exceedingly fair-minded man and had a keen sense of his responsibility to the people of the United States and a genuine desire to prevent the waste of the people's money. Many times he went beyond the bounds of a partisan approach and evinced a real interest in the responsibilities which we in the Congress owe and should owe to the people who send us here. And most of all, he was one of those who far more than most had a broad sense of his responsibility to the people of the United States generally.

There are too few in Congress who are prepared to take that attitude.

One of the most outstanding characteristics of Louis Ludlow was that he met that responsibility seriously.

He was one of the kindliest men I have ever known. He hated to offend anyone but did not fail to realize the responsibilities that he was facing and to do what he could to meet those problems face to face.

I believe I probably spent more hours in the committee room with him than he spent with any other Member of the House. I always admired and trusted him.

He was devoted to his wife and family and they have stood by him through the long illness from which he suffered.

I take this opportunity of extending to them my sincerest and deepest sympathy and to be thankful that I have been privileged to work with such a fine citizen.

THE LATE HONORABLE LE ROY T. MARSHALL

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is with keen regret that I have requested this time to announce the death of a former Member of the House, Hon. Le Roy T. Marshall, of Xenia, Ohio, who in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses represented the Seventh Congressional District of Ohio, which I now have the honor to serve.

Mr. Marshall died on Wednesday of last week at the age of 67, after a rather long illness. Born on an Ohio farm, he worked his way through college; was for a time a school teacher; later was elected as clerk of court of his home county, and while clerk studied law. He became a political leader and chairman of the Greene County Republican Committee. He was elected to the State senate, where he served with distinction for two terms, from 1928 until 1932. In 1933 Mr. Marshall became a Member of the House of Representatives, where he served as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Education, and the Committee on Mines and Mining with great distinction, honor, and credit to himself and to the Seventh District of Ohio.

Le Roy T. Marshall was not only an outstanding lawyer and able legislator, but also was a leader of men. He was a gentleman of splendid character and reputation. I do not believe Roy Marshall ever did a little or mean thing. The world is better for his having lived. We will miss him. Our sympathy goes out to his family in their hour of bereavement.

In the passing of L. T. Marshall, Ohio and America have lost a great citizen.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. I appreciate what the gentleman has said about Roy Marshall. Roy Marshall was a very keen-minded man; he had a fine grasp of public questions, and when he was in Congress he made a mark for himself as a man of distinction and ability. I am proud to stand here and say that for Roy Marshall.

EGGS AND COMMUNIST CHINA

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, the serious turn of events in Korea in which we find ourselves in an undeclared war with the Chinese Communists should spotlight and force action on the dubious trade policies that the administration and our so-called friends and allies have been following. Many Members of the Congress have called attention to the trade with the Communist countries, including the Chinese Reds, and have requested action to no avail. The truth is that the Communist countries declared economic warfare on the United States nearly 2 years ago, and in recent months have been stepping up their activities.

One direct result of the Red economic warfare was revealed about 10 days ago when the Secretary of Agriculture announced the biggest short-changing trick of all time—the end of price supports on eggs after the end of the year. This directly affected every farm family in the United States. The reason given was his inability to dispose of the dried egg stocks that he had accumulated in previous price-support operations. Over $100,000,000 has been invested in these stocks, and they will be practically a total loss. What the Secretary of Agriculture does not explain is why he has been unable to move these stocks. A dried-egg industry was created during the last war to supply the needs of the British. Egg production likewise was encouraged. It was continued for the same reason after the war. When the funds from the British loan ran low, there was no longer any interest in dried eggs at any price. This was the beginning of our huge stocks of dried eggs.

I am informed that the British have during the past 2 years made heavy purchases of dried and frozen eggs in China. During the past year the imports of dried eggs from Communist China to the United States have steadily increased each month, and in the month of September broke all previous records. I am also informed that if imports of dried eggs from Red China and shell eggs from Canada had been stopped, plus the British taking their needs from the United States at less than 20 cents on the dollar, which we offered, there would be no burdensome stocks, and no need to discontinue the price-support program.

The administration, however, prefers to deal with a Government that we do not recognize—the same Chinese Reds whose troops are fighting our boys in Korea. These dollar-earning imports are in effect financing the purchases of cotton and other war potentials to be used against our troops. The British likewise are contributing to the Communist war effort. In the present undeclared war with Communist China, is not it about time to stop this trading with the enemy, and apply economic sanctions?

THE LATE HONORABLE WILLIAM MILLER, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my solemn and saddening duty today to report to the House the death of a former Member, Bill Miller.

Bill Miller was known to a great many Members of this august body. Although he had many handicaps through life which he received in the service of his country, Bill Miller served his district, the First District of Connecticut, very ably.

During World War I Bill Miller enlisted and served 2 years in France. During that service he was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the United States Air Corps, and in the waning hours of that horrible conflict he crashed in his fighter plane and lost both legs. Despite that loss Bill went on to great accomplishments in his home State, Connecticut. He served as a departmental commander of the American Legion and as a national committeeman of the American Legion. He was elected to the Congress three consecutive times. During his service here he always had the interests of the veterans at heart.

To Mrs. Miller, another great soldier, I offer my most solemn, sincere, and deep sympathies and condolences.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about Bill Miller. He was killed on an airfield during the First World War, known as Issoudun. Many of the old World War I fliers will know what I mean. It was my privilege to be there with him as a fellow officer, and I flew from that same field for over 3 months before leaving for the front. All of us were very lucky to get back without injury. As I think about those days I feel we were all fortunate not to lose our legs, like Bill Miller did, to say nothing of our lives.

I found that in his work here in Congress he was a conscientious diligent worker and I admired him tremendously. With all his affliction he worked very hard, and his conduct was statesmanlike and in accordance with the best traditions of the House of Representatives.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his family.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in this body in mourning the loss of Bill Miller. I think that Bill Miller truly exemplified those immortal words of Shakespeare:

His life was gentle; the elements so mixed in him that nature might stand up and say to all the world: "This was a man."

I served with Bill in the Eightieth Congress. Bill was the dean of our delegation; he was a legislator of great ability and foresight; he was a man of perfect courage. Never once did any of us see him give in to his physical affliction. He was cheerful; he was friendly; he was a good friend. I am sure that all of us who served with him can well remember the times when he would come up to this microphone in his wheel chair and he would make a speech which was always thoughtful and provocative and which made a real contribution to our deliberations.

Mr. Speaker, Bill Miller was a man of intelligence; he was a conscientious public servant; he was a patriotic and devoted American. I extend my deepest sympathy to his wife and to his relatives. I mourn the loss of a warm personal friend.

Peace, peace! he is not dead, he doth not sleep—
He hath awakened from the dream of life—
'Tis we, who lost in stormy visions, keep
With phantoms an unprofitable strife,
And in mad trance, strike with our spirit's knife
Invulnerable nothings—we decay
Like corpses in a charnel; fear and grief
Convulse us and consume us day by day,
And cold hopes swarm like worms within our living clay.
He hath outsoared the shadow of our night;
Envy and calumny and hate and pain,
And that unrest which men miscall delight,
Can touch him not and torture not again;
From the contagion of the world's slow stain
He is secure.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RIBICOFF].

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to pay tribute to my distinguished predecessor in this House, the late Hon. William J. Miller, of Wethersfield, Conn. Mr. Miller served with outstanding distinction in the Seventy-sixth, Seventy-eighth, and Eightieth Congresses from the First District of Connecticut.

During his three terms in Congress, Mr. Miller had the respect and affection of the entire membership of this great body on both sides of the aisle. He was most zealous in his work in committee, on the floor, and in behalf of the constituents of his district.

Although he lost both legs as a result of a World War I airplane accident, Mr. Miller had a successful career in politics, insurance, and veterans' affairs. He, as much as any other man, inspired those others physically disabled by his rise to a place of national prominence. He was characterized by a Washington newspaperman as a man of "almost boundless energy, complete with an ability to grasp the precise fundamentals of a situation and the sometimes stubborn independence of his own political leaders has high-lighted his service as a first-term House Member."

Mr. Miller was born in North Andover, Mass., on March 12, 1899, the son of James B. and Katherine S. Miller. He attended public school there and in Lawrence, Mass. In September 1917, at the age of 18, he enlisted in the aviation section, Signal Corps, United States Army. Three months later he was in France and while there had the accident that eventually led to the loss of both legs.

Bill Miller, whose cheerfulness in spite of his handicap won for him the nickname of "Smiling Bill," was a great and outstanding American. Congressman Miller, before coming to Congress, was active in the business and civic life of Connecticut. In 1936 he was elected commander of the Department of Connecticut of the American Legion. During his term of office, the American Legion reached a record State membership.

It should fill all of us with a deep sense of humility to realize that a man who was forced to spend the greater portion of his active life in a wheelchair could accomplish the many things he did.

Bill Miller's untimely death at the age of 51 was a great shock to me. One of the most pleasant experiences of my life was my campaign against him in 1948. It was a very clean contest; both of us respected one another, devoting the entire campaign to the great issues confronting our Nation, and at no time indulging in personalities. He was a fine gentleman, and we became friends during and after the campaign.

There is much in Bill Miller's career that we all could follow in serving our Nation. He had an independent spirit and mind. When he thought his party's leadership was wrong, he voted as his conscience dictated. On veterans' affairs he was a recognized authority. He was independent, kind, and thoughtful, and always respected another's point of view. Hartford County, the State of Connecticut, and the United States of America have suffered a great loss in his death.

I extend my deepest sympathies to his widow and other members of his family.

Under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include as part of these remarks two editorials, one from the Hartford Courant of November 23, 1950, and one from the Hartford Times of November 24, 1950:

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of November 23, 1950]

WILLIAM J. MILLER

Former Congressman William J. Miller attained a remarkable degree of success despite a physical handicap that would have discouraged a less courageous man. Six times he sought election to Congress. Three times he won, three times he tasted defeat. But he was never embittered by the adverse turning of the wheel of political fate.

Bill Miller wore nobody's collar when he was in Congress. When he thought his party's leadership was wrong, he voted as his conscience dictated. On veterans' affairs he was a recognized authority. On more than one occasion he commanded bipartisan support, and at least once he was accorded a standing ovation by the whole House. Such recognition of his mastery of the subject of legislation for veterans was fully deserved.

Not only in Congress, but in the business of the American Legion fearlessness characterized Bill Miller. He stood against payment of the adjusted compensation certificates when it was unpopular to take that stand. He insisted on the maximum of reasonable care for disabled veterans, especially those in hospitals. He did not hesitate to tell the able-bodied veterans to stand on their own feet, not to lean on the Government or their wartime service. This took the kind of courage of which Bill Miller had plenty.

If Bill Miller could be firm, he also had a big heart and a winning personality. He could state his views without offense. And he was not bitter toward those who disagreed with him. In his six campaigns, win or lose, the returns showed no loss of popularity for his forthright statements. He always did a bit better than most others on the Republican ticket. He was a good citizen, a conscientious legislator, and a loyal friend.

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Times of November 24, 1950]

WILLIAM J. MILLER

In looking back on the career of William J. Miller, it is hard to believe that a man forced to spend most of his active life in a wheel chair could accomplish the things he did. He was only 18 when he enlisted in the aviation section, Signal Corps, of the United States Army in World War I, became a sergeant, and then a military aviator with the commission of second lieutenant. A month after the armistice, he was taking advanced instruction at a flying field in France. His plane crashed, crippling him and resulting 5 years later in the loss of both legs. Since then Bill Miller had been wheeled about, always genial, smiling, friendly, and making friends wherever he went. He was able to build up an insurance business, actively engage in American Legion affairs, and finally get the Republican nomination for Congress, and in a series of victories and defeats in biennial contests with Herman P. Kopplemann, Democrat, served three terms.

As a Congressman, Mr. Miller served his district well. He was reasonably independent, took his duties seriously, and, despite his handicap, maintained a good attendance record in the House. His familiar figure sitting with bent head in his wheel chair, has passed from the scene. The cheerful, half-salute with which he greeted them will be long remembered by his host of friends throughout this district. His death at 51 was untimely. He met it with the same fortitude that enabled him to live an active and useful life in spite of a tremendous handicap.

(Mr. RIBICOFF asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include two editorials, one from the Hartford Courant and another from the Hartford Times.)

Mrs. WOODHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mrs. WOODHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, in the untimely death of former Congressman Wiliam J. Miller, Connecticut has lost a public-spirited citizen and a devoted public servant. In spite of his tragic accident and the resulting heavy physical handicap under which he labored, he always faced life with courage and determination. His logical mind cut through the symptoms and to the heart of the problems which his State and Nation faced during the troubled years of his service in Congress. While holding steadfast to the principles of his party, his was never the blind partisan approach. Always he weighed the issues in the broad light of the needs of the time and the thinking of the people of his district. His were social-minded decisions based on well-considered facts.

Mr. Miller was a friend to anyone with a problem. In turn, he had hosts of friends in Hartford County and throughout the State who will miss him but will always remember him as a symbol of courage, of human kindness, and of human understanding.

Connecticut will long remember William J. Miller as one who served his State well.

Our deepest sympathy goes to Mrs. Miller, who through all the years has been the devoted helpmate and companion of her husband in all his undertakings.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it was a great shock to me to learn of the passing of Bill Miller. I recall the first time I met him, back in World War I days, when he was fighting pain in a hospital bed. You could not help but marvel at and admire his courage, his determination to get well and, despite the loss of his legs, succeed in his personal and his political ambitions.

Bill Miller was an indefatigable worker. He never admitted defeat in anything he did; he kept on fighting hard, sometimes against unsurmountable odds. This fine mental and moral courage carried him to success in his business career and won for him three terms in this House.

Naturally, his interest in veterans' affairs was great. Seriously disabled himself, he had a personal deep understanding of the problems, especially rehabilitation problems, our wounded veterans had to face when they were discharged from the hospitals. He gave much of his time to this work, and we of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs soon learned to respect and value his testimony and suggestions when he appeared before our committee.

He was an outspoken, honest man. He never cast a political vote during his entire service in Congress. He did what he thought was right. Brave as a soldier, comscientious and fine as a Representative in the House of Representatives, Bill Miller's loss will be felt all through the years to come.

His widow was always extremely helpful to him in his work. She gave unselfishly of her life to help her husband in all of his endeavors. To her goes the deep sympathy and condolences of those who knew of her devotion to her husband in his private and public life.

The National Tribune of today's date carried a short item concerning his passing, and I give it herewith for the information it contains:

Former Representative William J. Miller, of Connecticut, who traveled the road to success without legs, died November 22 at his Wethersfield, Conn., home after a long illness. He was 51.

A World War I flier, Miller broke his back and lost both his legs in an airplane crash in France. For 4 years thereafter he lived in a cast.

Besides running for Congress five times and winning three times, Miller established a successful insurance business in his home town, served as department commander of the American Legion. He directed Legion relief work during the 1936 flood and was a member of its National Rehabilitation Commission at one time.

Born in North Andover, Mass., Miller attended public schools there and in Lawrence, Mass. He enlisted as a private in the aviation section of the Army Signal Corps and served 17 months in France, where he was commissioned as a second lieutenant.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks on the passing of the late William Miller at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

FARM MACHINERY AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, it has long been recognized that our national well-being is dependent upon efficient and abundant production of food and fiber. Although I represent the largest textile district in the world, I am fully conscious of the importance of agriculture, especially at this time of crisis. I now invite your attention to the acute situation confronting those who till the soil and thus provide the essential food and fiber, not only for civilian needs but of imperative necessity in our program of national defense. During World War II, total agricultural production increased about one-third. This permitted the shipment of large supplies of food, feed, and fiber products to our allies and to other countries in need. Of more significance for the future, perhaps, is the fact that it permitted increased domestic consumption of farm products in this country.

Twice in the course of the past 30 years, American agriculture has been called upon to enlarge its production to fill demands created by war, and, in each case, our farmers have responded by expanding their output of food and fiber to meet the increased demands.

Today, fortunately, due to more scientific farming and mechanization, fewer people are required to produce an adequate supply of agricultural commodities for domestic and foreign consumption than a century ago. It has been estimated that 72 percent of the working force in the United States in 1820 was engaged in agricultural work, and only about 28 percent pursued nonagricultural livelihoods. As time passed the agricultural force represented a smaller and smaller proportion of the total labor force. By 1940, this percentage had dropped to 18. It is likely that even a smaller percentage is now engaged in agriculture. This increased output per person on our farms is encouraging, particularly at this time when so many of our people are needed in industry to supply the Nation with defense materials and goods for domestic consumption and at a time when so many of our young people are needed in the Armed Forces. However, in view of the fact that the farm-labor force is constantly decreasing in numbers and the source of animal power available for use on farms is shrinking, we must substitute more and more mechanical power for manpower in order to be assured of larger output from our farms and to release farm boys and men to help build up the Armed Forces and essential industries. We cannot afford to dissipate our farm plant; we must keep it in the best possible operating condition.

Recent surveys indicate that purchases of farm machinery for the first half of 1950 were lower than for the same period during 1948 and 1949. Reduced farm incomes during the first half of 1950, along with relatively high machinery prices, were no doubt leading factors contributing to the lower purchases. Since last July, however, the demand for farm machinery has increased partly because of expected higher prices of farm products, larger farm incomes, and perhaps some forward buying. Current production of machinery has not kept pace with the increased demand because of material shortages and labor difficulties. It is estimated that even with increased production since July, the total output of machinery in 1950 may be somewhat below the high production of 1948 and 1949.

The demand for farm machinery is expected to continue at a high level because of prospectively higher farm incomes. Prices of machinery are also expected to be higher because of higher material and labor costs. Output may be restricted, particularly toward the end of the year, because of shortages of materials resulting from the rearmament program. During 1951, shortages of some of the newer machines might be experienced unless manufacturers are assured of an adequate supply of steel and associated materials.

Peacetime prosperity and war activity always stimulate the demand for steel and related products. Steel producers have responded to this demand by increasing their production. But here the question arises as to how much of this steel should be used for the manufacture of military equipment and other industrial machinery. It has been called to my attention that the "maximum production of farm machinery does not take more than 2 percent of this country's annual output of iron and steel, and that many times 2 percent are consumed in the manufacture of less basic items." In view of this fact and the importance of building up an adequate supply of modern power machinery on our farms, it appears reasonable that if it is necessary to establish priorities on the use of steel, the priority for farm machinery should be second only to priorities established for military equipment.

Another matter worthy of consideration is that the use of a high percentage of farm machinery is to a very great extent seasonal. Manufacturers plan their production accordingly. Because of the seasonal need for machinery, just a few weeks delay in supplying farmers with many types of machines has the same effect as a year's delay. It should be clear, therefore, that it is not enough to avoid a reduction in the quantity of steel available for the manufacture of farm machinery, but we must also provide these manufacturers with an adequate supply of materials at the proper time so that the seasonal demand for machinery can be met.

Ever since the adoption of power-driven machinery in this country, the number of tractors on farms has steadily increased, but estimates indicate that the present number of tractors on our farms is far from the ultimate tractor population. This is true also for some other major farm machines. It will, no doubt, require several years with a relatively high farm income and adequate supplies of farm machinery to build up the mechanization of our farms to a level consistent with the task ahead of the American farmers, particularly in view of the constantly shrinking farm labor supply.

Statistics compiled by a farm machinery manufacturer indicate that roughly 1 ton of iron and steel is required for each tractor and approximately another ton for the average number of farm implements associated with each tractor. In this connection, it was also pointed out that the unavailability of less than 50 tons of one type of steel and less than 10 tons of another type of steel would prevent the manufacture of about 1,000 tractors. A similar situation exists with respect to the manufacture of other farm implements.

Since farm machinery is vital in an over-all program of building up our national strength, it behooves us to make available to machinery manufacturers the necessary materials to assure adequate supplies of modern farm machinery. In the event that priorities and allocations of materials are necessary to accomplish this, these allocations should be made early in the development of our defense program.

THE LATE EDWIN M. SCHAEFER

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'BRIEN] may be permitted to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the death of my former colleague in Congress, Edwin M. Schaefer, brings to my mind an even deeper appreciation of his good qualities for which we all respected and admired in him while he was a Member of Congress from Illinois.

He was a rare type of a Representative, one who appreciated the plight of his fellow man and tried in his own way to lighten the burden of the oppressed. He was strong in his convictions but quick to appreciate the opinions of those who might differ with him.

During the trying period of World War II none was more concerned with the duties destiny had thrust upon him than he, and it is saddening to realize that the time granted him for relaxation after laying aside his congressional duties has been all too short.

Those who had the good fortune to serve with him in the House of Representatives have seen the passing of a man who was held in high regard and great respect and the State of Illinois has lost a son who brought her only distinction by his legislative activities.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an article appearing in the Great Falls Tribune.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

[Mr. MANSFIELD addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House today for 20 minutes, following any special orders heretofore entered.

TOTAL MOBILIZATION

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, here in the Capital of the Nation we regard proudly as the greatest in the world, we stand as if hypnotized by the swelling tide of fear and indecision.

Our people must be told that we are in our greatest crisis; that our hope for survival as a free nation is immediate total mobilization—a marshaling of all the productive resources and manpower which form our chief strength.

Although General Bradley has said we have nothing to offer the foe but the atomic bomb, our assembly lines continue to spew forth the bright baubles of peacetime.

Hesitantly, a pitiful patchwork of controls is being fashioned. In this Congress, at this session, we should have the courage to gear every citizen and every machine to the dreadful demands of the struggle for national self-preservation.

DEAN ACHESON

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, out at my hotel there lives one of the most interesting characters I ever knew. He is an ex-United States Senator and a great scholar. Last evening, after Secretary Acheson had made his address over the radio, a group of people gathered in the lobby of the hotel and were discussing Dean Acheson, when someone spoke up and said: "His is a case for the vigilantes. He ought to be hanged."

"Oh, no, do not hang him," said this scholar and seer, who, continuing, said: "I recall that in 1914, when Villa captured General Carranza, who, as you recall, wore a great beard, friends of the old general, who feared for his life, influenced a number of Senators, of whom I was one, to send a telegram to Villa not to hang General Carranza, to which we received the classic reply: 'Hang General Carranza? Why, no! I am not going to hang him. I am going to shave the old rascal and show the world what a fraud he is.'"

GOVERNOR WARREN FABULOUS VOTE GETTER

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a short editorial from the Oakland Tribune.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the vote in the recent election for Governor in California was one of the most astounding in the history of elections.

Governor Warren demonstrated that he is a fabulous vote getter. The record is that he beat his opponent by over 1,250,000. It is particularly eloquent in view of the fact that Governor Warren had already served the State of California for two terms, a total of 8 years of service. With all the controversies and misunderstandings that can be engendered in the course of eight hectic years in a State like California, it seems incredible that the Governor, running for a third term, could make such a remarkable run. California is a complicated State, and during those two terms gained over 4,000,000 in population. On his record primarily, and partly on his personality, Mr. Warren endeared himself so strongly to the people of California that he was able to win this election by such an astounding vote. The secret of his success, in my humble opinion, is due to the fact that he does not play petty politics, either party politics or any other kind of politics.

He grapples with the problems submitted to him and tries to find the right answer. He makes appointments on the basis of merit. He works harmoniously with the civil-service group, which accounts in large part for the excellent administration of the office of Governor and all its branches during his incumbency. He has a minimum of differences with the legislature, and has the knack that every great executive must have of getting along with people and of picking out excellent associates to help him handle the big job. He is truly a governor serving all the people.

I enclose a résumé of the election as set forth in the Oakland Tribune under the date of November 19, 1950. It should be of interest to every Member of the House, as all of us must submit ourselves to an election every 2 years.

ROOSEVELT TROUNCED

The day after the general election you knew that Governor Warren had swept every one of California's 68 counties and trounced James Roosevelt by well over 1,000,- 000 votes. But since then the paper-and-pencil boys have come up with some sidelight figures you may find interesting. Delving back into the record we find that no other candidate in the history of California was beaten as badly as Roosevelt and that the majority against him was greater than that against any other major party candidate for Governor in any State in the Nation on November 7. Despite the fact that 58.39 percent of the voters in California are registered as Democrats, Roosevelt polled only about 35.29 percent of the total vote. Putting it another way, Roosevelt's vote amounted to only 42.61 percent of his party's registration, while the vote for Governor Warren ran to better than 123.03 percent of his party's registration. In piling up a greater majority than given any other Governor in the election, Governor Warren also amassed a greater majority than given to any candidate for United States Senate in the Nation. And that leads to the observation that Governor Warren won Los Angeles County alone by a greater majority than Senator ROBERT A. TAFT gathered in the entire State of Ohio. You may have seen the story in the news columns, but the Knave mentions it again because backers of Senator TAFT seem to have been giving out with the idea that their man was the only Republican able to carry industrial centers. We respectfully call to their attention the heavy industrial areas in Los Angeles, San Pedro, San Diego, San Francisco, Contra Costa, and Alameda Counties. And we might add, again, that each of those areas has a preponderance of Democratic registration. Senator TAFT waged a vigorous campaign, but the Knave is joined by other observers who believe some of his supporters slipped their trolley when they attempted to imply that his victory surpassed that of Governor Warren.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

[Mr. JAVITS addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

THE TAX SITUATION

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I know that the housewives of this country will be delighted to go through the technical process of collecting taxes for the United States Government under social security. To the end that they may understand what their duties will be after January 1, 1951, I am inserting in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Wall Street Journal of November 30, 1950:

UNITED STATES TO DROP DUTIES OF A TAX COLLECTOR ON HARRIED HOUSEWIFE—SOCIAL SECURITY LEVY MUST BE HELD FROM DOMESTIC WORKERS' PAY NEXT YEAR

WASHINGTON.—Got a maid, laundress, cook, valet, or chauffeur?

Do you hire a baby sitter when you take your wife out to dinner or to the movie 2 nights a week?

Do you hire a housekeeper, nursemaid, furnace man, handy man, footman, or practical nurse?

If your answer to any of these questions is "yes," you're about to become a part-time bureaucrat.

Beginning January 1, you'll join the army of Uncle Sam's tax collectors. Your job will be bookkeeper and tax collector, as well as taxpayer. It's all because of the new social-security law which entitles 1,000,000 household workers to pensions when they reach 65.

To help housewives and their husbands understand the new law, the Federal Security Agency and the Bureau of Internal Revenue have just published a new pamphlet entitled: "The New Social Security Law May Concern You."

These workers don't have to work full time for you to be concerned. They only have to meet the "24–50" test. That is, you're liable for social-security taxes if the household-employee works for you as much as 24 days during any calendar quarter and you pay her as much as $50 in cash wages. A day is 30 minutes or 10 hours, under the new law.

Internal Revenue Commissioner George J. Schoeneman and Arthur Altmeyer, Federal Security Administrator, bringing along a staff of experts, called a full-dress press conference yesterday to announce details of the scheme they've worked out for administering the new feature of the social-security law.

They thought their plan "the simplest that has ever been worked out in any country in the world." But newsmen raised some questions Mr. Schoeneman and Mr. Altmeyer didn't like to talk about.

Under prodding questions, the officials admitted that the housewife or her husband, depending on which is the employer—is subject to a fine of up to $10,000 or 5 years' imprisonment, or both, for failing to pay the new social-security levy.

Such severe penalties are reserved, the officials emphasized, for people who "wilfully and criminally" violate the law. Lesser violators will be subject to easier penalties, 6 percent interest on back taxes, for example.

But to be sure you dodge the jail term or heavy fine, you're supposed to deduct 1½ percent from your domestic worker's cash wages, beginning January 1. You must chip in another 1½ percent yourself. If you feel generous enough to pay the full 3-percent tax yourself, Mr. Schoeneman won't object.

At the end of each 3-month period, you're supposed to send the tax, along with a report of wages paid, to the collector of internal revenue.

To get a copy of the new booklet, ask at your local post office, or write to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington.

DR. JOSEPH W. WEINBERG AND STEVE NELSON

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, almost a year and a half ago the Un-American Activities Committee unanimously recommended to the Attorney General the prosecution for perjury of one Dr. Joseph W. Weinberg, also known as Scientist X. The committee, in making its recommendation, furnished the Attorney General with reliable witnesses who could prove that Weinberg testified falsely when he appeared before the committee on two occasions. The committee claims that he perjured himself when he denied association with Steve Nelson in Oakland, Calif., and when he denied attending Communist Party and Communist front-group meetings with other atomic bomb scientists in 1943, 1944, and 1945. The latest information given the committee is that Dr. Weinberg is still teaching nuclear physics to young men and women at the University of Minnesota. Now the burning question in our minds is: "Why has not this case been brought before a grand jury by the Attorney General?"

Steve Nelson, known Communist organizer and Soviet espionage agent, was also cited for contempt of Congress by an overwhelming vote of 372 to 1. Although several others cited for contempt at the same time have been indicted for this crime, Steve Nelson's name does not appear on the list. We are again forced to ask: "Why has the Attorney General failed to bring grand jury action against Steve Nelson?"

In both these cases there appears to be overwhelming congressional opinion that there is a probability of establishing guilt beyond all reasonable doubt. I cannot possibly give all the evidence against these two men in the minute I now have, and therefore have asked for time following regular legislative business of the House on Monday next to give in detail the accumulation of evidence against Steve Nelson and Dr. Joseph W. Weinberg.

Is the Department of Justice or the Attorney General still following the "red herring" policy as espoused by President Truman for so long? Surely Members of Congress will take notice of these two glaring cases and give help in persuading the Attorney General that some action is necessary, and that immediately.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico, Mr. FERNÓS-ISERN, is recognized for 10 minutes.

ORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. FERNÓS-ISERN. Mr. Speaker, on June 28 of this year, the House passed a bill to provide for the organization of a constitutional government by the people of Puerto Rico. It became a law on July 3, 1950. In accordance with its terms, and at a referendum to be held on June 4, 1951, the people of Puerto Rico will vote to accept or reject the law. It depends on the will of the people of Puerto Rico whether the law is to become effective. The law maintains the present economic, fiscal, and trade relations between Puerto Rico and the United States. It also maintains the present representation of Puerto Rico in the Congress, while recognizing the right of the citizens of Puerto Rico to organize their own government, as the people of any State of the Union would, in accordance with a State constitution of their own adoption.

Thus is being evolved a new type of Federal relationship between the United States and communities of United States citizens, organized in offshore areas. We, the people of Puerto Rico, offered this political formula to the Congress. The Congress accepted it at our request, and we are grateful. We are grateful, also, to President Truman, who signed the bill that it might become law. This law will not bring us into the Union as a State, but, under it, we shall continue to be a part of the greater United States of which all communities of United States citizens are a part.

I feel I should make a progress report to Congress at this time.

Under a law of the Legislature of Puerto Rico, there took place in Puerto Rico on November 4 and 5 of this year, a registration of new voters for the benefit of all those who have become of age since the last elections in 1948. These voters, together with those previously registered, will be called to the referendum on June 4, 1951, to vote for the acceptance or rejection of the law as passed by Congress.

We believe in democracy in Puerto Rico. We believe in freedom. We believe in the principles symbolized by our United States citizenship. Where close to 540,000 voters took a part in the elections of 1948, we have added, through the recent registrations, about 158,000 names to our list of eligible voters. This with a population of about 2,200,000.

This heavy registration has been a magnificent demonstration of the devotion of the people of Puerto Rico to the democratic process of government. It is so, not only because of the large registration recorded, but because this registration took place only 72 hours after the arrest of a self-styled leader of a frustrated so-called revolt which had taken place in the island of Puerto Rico.

On Monday, October 28, the police force of five towns and cities of Puerto Rico were fired upon by a handful of terrorists at each place. Simultaneously, the Governor's residence was attacked. A few other sporadic attacks were made at other places. In all, seven policemen and a national guardsman were killed. Sixteen terrorists were also killed. There were a few other casualties.

There was no need to declare martial law. The perpetrators of those assaults have been arrested. They will be brought to trial. They will be punished in accordance with law.

The people of Puerto Rico will not be misled by anyone posing as a self-appointed master of the people; a curious sort of professional nationalist who insists upon graduating from the nineteenth century college of liberation by force when we belong to the twentieth century class of liberation by law. It reminds me of Huckleberry Finn trying to free his friend, Jim, through a tunnel he would dig, while the door was unlocked all the while.

The people of Puerto Rico will continue to develop their lives normally, under the law, in a setting of peace and order. They will continue to run their government democratically. They deplore and pity the dementia of the obsessed, but, for themselves, they will maintain stability and sanity.

Much more than the deplorable happenings in Puerto Rico, the people of Puerto Rico were dismayed by the aberration of the two persons who tried the insensate attack on the Blair House. They were dismayed because the terrorists, although long-time residents of the mainland, were born in Puerto Rico. Because one of them has said that their deed was intended to bring freedom to Puerto Rico.

Mr. Speaker, we are living in an age where words seem to be going wild—or men are going wild in the use of words. In their disarranged minds, in order to bring about freedom, the head of this great Nation, the champion of freedom in the world, would be sacrificed. In order to bring about freedom to 2,000,000 people, their membership in the freest political system of the world would be brought to an end. In order to bring freedom to a democratic people, their democratic process of government would be interrupted; they would be deprived of the expression of their will through the ballot. They would be subjected to a fanatical dictatorship.

I am a physician. Perhaps I might find in the intricacies of psychiatry an explanation for this type of behavior and for the reasoning or lack of reasoning behind it. But outside of that, I can say this: Thank God this type of behavior and reasoning is not typical of the people of Puerto Rico.

Puerto Rico has a long history. But there are no pages in it except for love of peace, freedom, democracy, and order. There are no pages in it for terrorism. There are no pages in it for organized crime.

Puerto Rico will proceed full speed ahead in the organization of its own constitutional government, as a free state in federation with the United States. Puerto Rico will continue proudly to support our Federal democratic institutions, at home and abroad.

Right now, in Korea, the Sixty-fifth Infantry Regiment, made up completely of Puerto Ricans, is fighting gallantly for democracy in that corner of the world. And down in that other corner of the world, in Puerto Rico, their parents and relatives and friends are proud that our good, kind "jíbaros" may thus demonstrate their love for democracy, their patriotism as United States citizens, and their spirit of sacrifice.

It is not only in the realm of politics or in the realm of armed struggle that we show devotion to our way of life.

We should continue our operation "boot-strap"; we shall continue our endeavors to extricate ourselves from our present economic difficulties. In this, I know I shall continue to have the generous support of the Congress as always in the past; as a counterpart to Puerto Rico's operation boot-strap we shall continue here, and for Puerto Rico, our operation "boost."

With our faith in God, in the warmth of comradeship which our common citizenship gives us all, Mr. Speaker, the people of Puerto Rico will continue ahead, undaunted, confident of their future and of the future of this great Union whose existence is so essential to, and is the symbol of, the freedom of mankind in the world of today.

Puerto Rico knows that only within a truly democratic structure can it continue as the free commonwealth which it will become shortly after June 4, when the people of Puerto Rico will vote, overwhelmingly, to organize a constitutional government and become fully self-governing as provided by the law that Congress recently passed. Thus we shall be free citizens, in a free country, within the broad, great free country of our United States citizenship.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this address may appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[Mr. RIVERS addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

(Mr. DAVIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a resolution adopted by the American Legion Post of East Point, Ga.)

SEGREGATION IN SCHOOLS

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I regret that, at this time of national peril, when all segments and groups in this country should center their attention and efforts upon the major task which confronts us, certain pseudo-liberals and would-be progressives choose this as a time to continue to peddle their propaganda and create discord through efforts to promote their insidious, radical, left-wing philosophies.

I was surprised to read a newspaper article yesterday which stated that the president of the University of Virginia, speaking to the Conference of Southern Governors in Charleston, S. C., recommended that Southern States discard and abandon the policy to which they have always adhered, and upon which our entire educational system has been built. He urged that Southern States execute an about-face and admit Negroes to white graduate schools and professional schools.

The University of Virginia president, according to this newspaper story, urged his radical plan as one part of a broad program looking toward solution of what he referred to as a grave racial problem.

Another part of his broad program, as reported in the article, was a plan for more race mixing, namely, to place control of the entire educational program in mixed school boards of whites and blacks.

He affects great concern that there exists strong Negro sentiment for complete abolition of segregation in education, and advocates opening graduate and professional schools to Negroes because of "present-day conditions and trends," citing decisions of the Supreme Court regarding segregation.

Although it may be a new discovery to him, these are not the first days when radical agitators, both white and Negro, have undertaken to force the abolition of segregation upon the people of this country.

During reconstruction days the same kind of radical agitators who are agitating the subject now tried desperately to force the Southern States to accept these same policies they are now trying to promote.

In that day and time they were aided and abetted by a hostile Federal Government which, even at bayonet point, tried to force our defeated and helpless section to accept the same radical doctrine present-day agitators are promoting.

Today, as then, they are aided and abetted again by the Federal Government, this time not through soldiers armed with bayonets, but through Executive orders, and through judicial legislation handed down by a left-wing Supreme Court, two of whose members journeyed to New York City and testified as to the good character of the Communist spy, Alger Hiss, when he was on trial for his crimes.

It is true various orders have been issued from our executive department attacking segregation, and various judicial opinions have been rendered by the left-wing Supreme Court, in which they usurped legislative functions, also attacking segregation.

However, these activities do not lend any desirability to these radical doctrines, nor do they make them acceptable, nor do they make them constitutional.

The sensible, worth-while people of reconstruction times refused to knuckle under and accept the plans of the radicals. The sensible, worth-while people of this day will likewise defeat these radical proposals.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. This program of trying to destroy segregation in the Southern States is simply one of the plans of the Communist Party. It is being pushed by the Communists, their stooges, and fellow travelers. They are doing the Negroes of the South more harm than anything else that has taken place since the days of reconstruction; they are causing more of them to have to hunt homes. The decent, law-abiding, hard-working Negroes do not want segregation abolished. These Communist agitators, whether they are on the Supreme Court of the United States or on the White House staff, are doing the Negroes, as well as the white people of the South, far more harm than anybody else ever has done since the darkest days of reconstruction.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

This is a movement which must be met head-on, and defeated in the open. It cannot be handled by appeasement, or by efforts to placate the radicals.

The university president, by implication at least, offers his plan as an appeasement to the Negroes and to the Supreme Court, to placate them, so that those forces would not attempt to compel us to open the white public schools to Negroes. He implies that he opposes mixed public schools, although he advocates mixed public school boards.

He should know, if he does not know, that these Negro agitators, the radicals, pinks, and Communists, who are seeking to destroy all segregation, and to bring about race mixing, will not be appeased or placated by any such proposal as he makes. He is simply making himself a willing tool in their hands. He is lending his influence to their entire program, not only for destroying segregation in graduate and professional schools, but for destroying it in public or grade schools, in churches, hotels, restaurants, and theaters. He is striking a blow in favor of FEPC legislation, and in the final analysis, in favor of a mongrel America.

The University of Virginia recently in a suit involving admission of a Negro, practically let the suit go by default, and virtually consented that judgment be taken in the lower court requiring that the Negro be admitted. No vigorous defense was offered, and the case was not even appealed. It was a surrender, as the speech at Charleston was another surrender.

The present-day conditions and trends to which the doctor refers, do not require or justify such surrender as he has already made, and which he now recommends to other Southern States, after the fashion of the squirrel in Aesop's fable, who lost his tail in a trap and called a meeting of all the other squirrels to urge a new style and adoption of a rule requiring all squirrels' tails to be cut off.

Squirrels in the fable ran that faker out of the woods and kept their tails.

The Governors and universities of our Southern States likewise are not going to be taken in by such proposals as those made in the Charleston speech.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RIVERS. The gentleman recalls that when Colgate Darden was Governor of Virginia I do not believe he made one statement in which he advocated what he did in my home town of Charleston. If my memory serves me correctly, he was as quiet as a sphinx on this subject when he was in position to do something about it. Now that he has received a doctorate he assumes to himself the capacity of telling us how to run our business. If he is up on his own business as he thinks he is on mine, he ought to be pretty well informed.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

It is regrettable that in some quarters the belief is prevalent that the only way a southerner can be progressive and practice liberalism is to sell his people and his section down the river by endorsing and advocating left-wing, radical, crackpot, antisouthern doctrines.

It is not liberalism to abandon common sense, nor is it progressive to tear down institutions and customs which throughout all the ages and generations past have proved their worth and value.

These radical proposals offer nothing in return for that which they would destroy except the wholly unsubstantiated, unverified, weak assertion that progress lies in that direction.

That road does not lead to progress. It is a will-o'-the-wisp, actually leading to destruction of our strength, and would constitute a surrender to the radical pattern of communistic regimentation.

The public generally are waking up to the emptiness of those doctrines.

The public generally are getting tired of half-baked doctrines proposed by pseudo liberals.

The bar and the public know that the Supreme Court has been usurping legislative functions in the efforts of its left-wing members to promote radicalism, and if that practice is not stopped, a great deal of attention is going to be given to methods of restricting the Supreme Court to its own proper functions.

We have all seen in recent years the step-by-step procedure, through which many educational institutions have been brought into disrepute through the action of crackpots and pseudo liberals who have infiltrated into faculties and governing bodies of these educational institutions.

It is refreshing that some of them have seen the error of their ways, and are cleansing their faculties and governing bodies of these radical professors and officials.

In refreshing contrast to the abovementioned speech at Charleston, the American Legion, Post No. 51, at East Point, Ga., on October 9 adopted a resolution regarding certain suits pending in Federal courts seeking to force white schools to admit Negroes as pupils.

This resolution illustrates the attitude of the rank and file American people regarding these radical proposals. I insert this resolution herewith as a part of my remarks:

First. On September 19, 1950, there was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia a suit against the superintendent of the Atlanta city schools and the members of the Atlanta Board of Education, which suit prayed that the United States courts require that the authorities in charge of the public schools of Atlanta admit negro children to white schools.

Second. This suit had been previously encouraged and invited by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered on June 5, 1950, in cases involving the University of Texas Law School and the University of Oklahoma. In the Oklahoma and Texas cases the Supreme Court of the United States laid down a doctrine under which, if followed, the races must be educated together in the public schools beginning with the first grade. The suit to destroy the Atlanta public school system is a natural result of the decisions respecting Texas and Oklahoma.

Third. The suit to open Atlanta white schools to colored children is one case in a pattern of similar cases now pending in the Federal courts against the white people of America. A similar suit is now pending in Clarendon County, S. C.; four suits of this nature are now pending in North Carolina, one affecting the University of North Carolina and three affecting the public schools. In Louisiana four suits of this nature have been filed. Recently Negroes have been ordered admitted to the University of Delaware, the University of Virginia Law School, the University of Missouri, and the University of Arkansas, and it is stated that Negroes are soon to be admitted to the University of Tennessee.

Fourth. This onrushing destruction of white schools is being brought about by cheap-John Federal politicians such as President Truman and the present personnel of the Federal Supreme Court in connivance with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The plan is a political one designed to capture and solidify the Negro bloc vote both in the North and South. Its result will be the destruction, not only of the separation of the races, but of both the white and colored races themselves, and the consequent mongrelizing of this country.

Fifth. This plan and scheme is communism. It is a part of the Communist Party platform and the Communist Party line which has been taken up by the politicians above referred to.

Sixth. The members of this post fought on foreign battlefields to preserve the American way of life. We fought to preserve this Nation, this State, this community, and our own families and firesides. We stand appalled at the awful realization that those things for which we fought and for which many of our comrades died are today in dreadful peril from those who are in charge of the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by East Point Post. No. 51, Department of Georgia, American Legion, as follows:

1. The filing of the suits to open Atlanta white schools to Negroes is unreservedly condemned.

2. The filing of similar suits throughout the country is unreservedly condemned.

3. The action of the Supreme Court of the United States above referred to in encouraging and inviting the filing of such suits and the destruction of white schools is unreservedly condemned.

4. We condemn President Truman for his alliance with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People looking toward the destruction of separate schools for white and colored.

5. We commend Gov. Herman E. Talmadge for the pledge which he has made the people that the separation of the races will be preserved in the schools of Georgia during his administration as Governor.

6. We commend Congressman JAMES C. DAVIS for his courageous speech in the Congress of the United States on the 21st of September 1950, in which he undertook to arouse the people to the danger which confront us and said:

"The time has come again when action must be taken—when the people of our section must say to all usurpers of power, whether it be the Supreme Court, whether it be the President, or whoever it may be: 'Thus far you may come, but no farther.'"

7. In our opinion, the destruction of separate public schools for the races in the South would be a calamity from which there could be no recovery. The destruction of our civilization would ensue. Another civilization would arise, the pattern of which is set before us in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the islands of the Caribbean Sea.

8. In our opinion, it is the duty of all true men to resist the mingling of the races in the public schools and to oppose the same by all lawful means. The members of this post unanimously pledge themselves thereto, and call upon their fellow citizens to join them.

9. It is directed that a copy of this resolution be furnished the East Point Suburban Reporter, the Atlanta Journal and Atlanta Constitution, and the Georgia Legionnaire, and be spread upon the minutes of this post.

Unanimously adopted by East Point Post, No. 51, Department of Georgia, American Legion, on this ninth day of October 1950, at regular meeting of this date.

JAMES H. PORTER,
Commander.
E. M. LOYLESS,
Adjutant.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike at this particular time to make a speech of a controversial nature, or to deal with a subject which has any tendency to stir up or to promote strife.

I would not deal with this subject at all at this time, except for the fact that the president of the University of Virginia saw fit to recommend to the governors of the Southern States, which includes my own, a course of conduct which directly contravenes our customs, practices, and policies. We have pending in the State of Georgia now suits involving these particular questions. If this proposal coming from the source in question is permitted to go unnoticed, such action might be taken as indifference or as acquiescence. There is no indifference to this subject in my State, and there will be no acquiescence in such a proposal.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, December 1, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1751. A letter from the Deputy Attorney General, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill entitled "A bill to provide the privilege of becoming a naturalized citizen of the United States to all immigrants having a legal right to permanent residence"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1752. A letter from the Secretary, Smithsonian Institution, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill entitled "A bill relating to the policing of the buildings and grounds of the Smithsonian Institution and its constituent bureaus"; to the Committee on House Administration.

1753. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting proposed supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1951 in the amount of $80,525,000, together with certain proposed provisions and increases in limitations pertaining to existing appropriations (H. Doc. No. 724); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

1754. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of Export-Import Bank of Washington for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950 (H. Doc. No. 725); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

1755. A letter from the Director, Bureau of the Budget, transmitting a letter regarding reapportionment of the administrative expense authorization of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the fiscal year 1951, pursuant to paragraph 2 of subsection (e) of section 3679 of the Revised Statutes, as amended; to the Committee on Appropriations.

1756. A letter from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting a letter relative to the case of Pierre Maurice Piron, file No. A-6386229 CR 26395, requesting that it be withdrawn from those before the Congress and returned to the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1757. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of legislation passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Virgin Islands, pursuant to section 16 of the Organic Act of the Virgin Islands of the United States, approved June 22, 1936; to the Committee on Public Lands.

1758. A letter from the director, the American Legion, transmitting the financial statement of the American Legion up to and including October 31, 1950, pursuant to Public Law No. 47, Sixty-sixth Congress; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

1759. A letter from the Archivist of the United States, transmitting a report of lists or schedules covering records proposed for disposal by certain Government agencies; to the Committee on House Administration.

SENATE

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

At this altar of prayer which our fathers builded, we would be still and know that Thou art God. Forgive us that we talk so much and are silent so seldom; that we are in such constant motion and are so rarely still; that we depend so implicitly on the effectiveness of our own schemes and organization and so little on the power of Thy spirit.

Bewildered by the world's confusion and by the angry emotions of the time, we are tempted to lose certitude and stability and self-control. We would be true servants of Thy will in this troubled time. Teach us this and every day so to wait upon Thee that we may renew our strength, mount up with wings as eagles, run and not be weary, walk and not faint. We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. TAYLOR, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, November 30, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FLANDERS, because of official business, was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate on Monday next.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

PETITIONS

Petitions were laid before the Senate and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDING OFFICER:

A resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Eastern Dark Fired Tobacco Growers' Association, at Springfield, Tenn., relating to the internal affairs of that association; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A telegram in the nature of a petition from L. E. Barstow, of San Rafael, Calif., praying for the immediate removal of procommunists in the State Department; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A resolution adopted by the Thirteenth Annual Convention of the Institute of Engineers of Puerto Rico, condemning the recent attempted assassination of President Truman; ordered to lie on the table.

NORTH AMERICAN REGIONAL BROADCASTING AGREEMENT — RESOLUTION OF NATIONAL GRANGE, MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a very important resolution adopted by unanimous vote of the National Grange at Minneapolis, Minn., November 17, 1950. This resolution concerns the North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement and the National Grange opposition to it.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States Department of State signed on November 15, 1950, a North American radio treaty which permits Cuba the shared use of six specific United States clear channels and actually permits that nation to use all 24 United States clear channels, subject to only theoretical protection for our stations; and

Whereas the treaty permits, also, the shared use of clear channels in Jamaica and the Dominician Republic; and

Whereas nearby nations have received through a previous treaty and an interim agreement their fair share and in some cases, more than their fair share, of radio channels; and

Whereas the use of United States clear channels by foreign nations will cause interference to reception in rural areas in this country and also preclude at least on a number of clear channels the only means of improving rural radio coverage, namely through use of adequate power on clear-channel stations; and

Whereas these 24 clear channels have been the only medium through which most farm families have been afforded dependable night-time radio service in areas remote from cities; and

Whereas city listeners in the United States have more than an adequate amount of radio broadcast coverage; and

Whereas the National Grange has gone on record many times in the past in favor of clear channels and sufficient power on them to better serve rural and small-town listeners: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Grange in annual session in Minneapolis, Minn., vigorously protests this treaty signed by the United States Department of State as a gross injustice to the rural families of the United States and instructs the Washington office to oppose its ratification by the United States Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina (for himself, Mr. LANGER, Mr. ECTON, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. NEELY):

S. 4215. A bill to increase the rates of compensation of officers and employees of the Federal Government, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. MURRAY:

S. 4216. A bill for the relief of Fares Nujra Saliba; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. MCMAHON introduced Senate bill 4217, to authorize a Federal civil-defense program and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. ANDERSON:

S. 4218. A bill relating to the policing of the buildings and grounds of the Smithsonian Institution and its constituent bureaus; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself and Mr. CAIN) introduced Senate bill 4219, to authorize a Federal civil defense program and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MAGNUSON:

S. J. Res. 210. Joint resolution providing that a copy of the document entitled "Survival Under Atomic Attack" shall be furnished to every home in the United States; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. President, I introduce at this time a bill for the creation of a Civil Defense Authority, and ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The bill (S. 4217) to authorize a Federal civil defense program and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MCMAHON, was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KEFAUVER subsequently said: Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and myself, I introduce a bill to provide a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). The bill seems to be identical, in purpose, with the bill which was introduced previously by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], which was ordered to lie on the table. The same course will be followed with respect to this bill.

The bill (S. 4219) to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself and Mr. CAIN), was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY FOR INVESTIGATION OF FIELD OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Mr. MURRAY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 367), which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

Resolved, That the authority of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, under Senate Resolution 140, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to August 15, 1949 (providing for a study and investigation of the entire field of labor-management relations), is hereby continued through January 31, 1951.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. NEELY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Andrew J. Howard, Jr., of the District of Columbia, to be associate justice of the municipal court for the District of Columbia; and

John A. Remon, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency for the term expiring March 3, 1955.

OUR FOREIGN PROBLEMS AND THEIR DANGERS—EDITORIAL FROM WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, the American people want to know the truth concerning our foreign problems and their dangers. They are capable of facing those dangers when they understand them. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Tell Us the Truth," published in the Evening Star of November 30, 1950. The editorial comments on the radio address of Secretary of State Acheson on November 28. In my opinion, it expresses the very deep feelings of many citizens not only in Massachusetts, but all over the country at the present time. I base this statement on the number of telegrams and the amount of correspondence I have received. I hope that responsible administration officials will give us the facts as accurately and unreservedly as they can from time to time. In this way the support of the American people in a dangerous and difficult situation can be assured. I regret that the statements of our top officials have not done so sufficiently fully up to the present time.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TELL US THE TRUTH

Secretary Acheson did not say the things that needed to be said in his talk to the people last night.

It was a good speech. In a less desperate period it would have been an admirable speech. The Secretary of State was spreading upon the record once again a statement of what it is that we are trying to do in this gravely menaced world. He was refuting once more the false accusation that our aim is not peace, but conquest. He was trying to appeal to the Chinese people over the heads of their savage, lying leaders. He was trying to stiffen the backbone of our wavering allies. And he was trying to impress our own people with an understanding of the gravity of the hour and the urgency of the need for united, courageous action.

Mr. Acheson faced up to the fact that the Chinese Communists and their Soviet collaborators have shown their willingness to accept the risk of war, and he said this makes it increasingly urgent for all American citizens to face squarely the danger that confronts us, and to give vigorous and united support to the measures we must take to meet this danger.

Well and good. But just what is the official estimate of the danger that confronts us? Does Mr. Acheson really cling to any lingering hope that we can engage in fruitful just negotiations with a Chinese government whose representatives, appearing before the United Nations, have shown themselves to be wholly devoid of any sense of truth or integrity? There is no foundation to support the slightest faith in the usefulness of negotiations with these people.

If Mr. Acheson no longer has faith in the tactic of negotiation with the Chinese or the Russians, and it is difficult to believe that he could have, what is the nature of the measures which he says must be taken and which he calls upon the people to support?

To state this matter briefly, Mr. Acheson, the President, or some appropriate official, should tell the American people the truth. The people have a right to know whether, in the best judgment of their Government, the prospect now is for war, not peace. Mr. Acheson did not declare himself on this point last night. Until someone takes his courage in hand and spreads the truth, or our best official estimate of the truth, upon the record, there is little point in calling upon the people to face up to a danger that has not been clearly defined, or in expecting them to support measures which, so far as they have been stated, are utterly inadequate if war is being forced upon us.

MR. TRUMAN'S HELPERS—EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON STAR

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the body of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Mr. Truman's Helpers," which appears in today's Washington Star. It ends with the following language:

The fate of the civilized world may well hang on the soundness of the decisions which Harry Truman will have to make, and, in the last analysis, he will have to make them alone, in consultation with his God and his heart and his conscience. He will have the sympathy and support of all thinking people, but there will be none to envy him.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. TRUMAN'S HELPERS

There are those who think that the President should pay more attention to advice from the Senate in a time of great national crisis like the present. So, for whatever they may be worth, the Star has culled from the news columns the following offerings of senatorial opinion:

Senator CONNALLY, who is too old a hand to venture out on limbs that may be sawed off, thinks that the Security Council should be called upon to take appropriate action to bring about a quick showdown in Korea. Senator O'MAHONEY would serve the Russians with an ultimatum to get the Chinese troops out of Korea.

Senators BREWSTER and BRIDGES believe that General MacArthur should be given full authority to use the atom bomb if he thinks it is necessary. Senator CAIN says the Senate should demand that General MacArthur be given authority to send troops (he didn't say what troops) and planes across the Manchurian border. Senator FERGUSON urges that the United Nations give General MacArthur authority to wage all-out war, and Senator SMITH believes Chiang Kai-shek's troops should be thrown into the fight.

The chances are that the President will not find these suggestions very helpful. It might be simpler for him, though the result would be somewhat chaotic, if he could adopt all of them and then wash his hands of the whole business. But, as President, he cannot escape responsibility for the consequences of his judgments. The fate of the civilized world may well hang on the soundness of the decisions which Harry Truman will have to make, and, in the last analysis, he will have to make them alone, in consultation with his God and his heart and his conscience. He will have the sympathy and support of all thinking people, but there will be none to envy him.

SHIPS SOLD BY THE MARITIME COMMISSION TO THE CHINESE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. FLANDERS obtained the floor.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield to the Senator from Maine with the understanding, by mutual agreement, that he shall not read more than the statement he now holds in his hand.

Mr. BREWSTER. The very careful Senator from Vermont failed to limit me as to what I should say but limited me as to what I should read. However, I shall not take advantage of that technicality.

Mr. President, I read an item which deals with the question of the transfer of American matériel to the Chinese National Government, and in line therewith I wish to commend the extraordinary work of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] in connection with his investigation. I read as follows:

The Maritime Commission sold to the Chinese Nationalist Government 33 ships, 11 of which were operated by the China Union Line, the remaining 22 by the China Merchant Steam Navigation Co. Of these 33 ships, 3 were Victories, 9 Liberties, and the rest N-3's of 2,760 dead-weight tons each.

The crew of one Chinese ship turned Communist while it was in Singapore with a cargo of salt for SCAP. That ship still remains in that port. The crew of six other ships, consisting of one Liberty and five N-3's, defected in Hong Kong January 16, 1950. Nine months later, September 16, 1950, the six ships in Hong Kong sailed for Canton, where they are now actually in the hands of the Chinese Communist government.

In this 9-month period the American State Department conducted active and aggressive negotiations with the British authorities in Singapore, Hong Kong, and London to obtain control of these ships to protect the Maritime Administration's mortgages. The British, from Foreign Minister Bevin down, refused to recognize American representations and the Maritime Administration was denied the use of British Admiralty and other courts to test their claims because the British maintained that its recognition of Communist China gave to them sovereign immunity. Bevin refused to use their Order in Council, which is the highest decree that can be issued in Britain and which was used in the case of Chennault's airplanes to impound these ships for the United States Government. Mr. Rankin—who is now our chief Foreign Service officer in Formosa, was consul general in Hong Kong during these negotiations and when these ships sailed for Canton, he cabled the State Department that this had come about with the—

That is Mr. Karl Rankin, a diplomatic official of long service—

I quote what purports to be the exact language of Mr. Rankin's report—

"tacit connivance of the British."

Three of the six ships which sailed from Hong Kong were bought from the Maritime Administration by the Export-Import Bank, which had advanced the money to Nationalist China and who now holds the mortgages. The Government departments involved in these negotiations are State, Army, the Export-Import Bank, and the Maritime Administration.

I hope the resolution offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] providing for a more thorough going investigation of transfers of vital and critical material to the Chinese Communists may be speedily considered and adopted.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me so I may respond to the statement just made by the Senator from Maine? It will not be a lengthy statement. It will be but one sentence or two.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield without losing the floor thereby.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. O'CONOR. I wish to say that the points made by the Senator from Maine are indeed well taken. I agree entirely with what he has stated with regard to the facts and his statement presents a very unfortunate situation, to say the least.

It probably would be unwise to go into any further detail at this minute, other than to state that this matter has been receiving the attention of the subcommittee previously appointed. As a matter of fact, an executive hearing has been held in regard to the matter, and I can give assurance to the Senator from Maine, who is so interested in this question, and to other Senators, that it will continue to receive the careful and serious attention it deserves.

THE PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT RESPECTING USE OF THE ATOMIC BOMB

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, there was in the minds of all of us, I am sure, a sudden and serious surprise when it was reported yesterday morning that the President was considering the use of the atomic bomb in the Chinese situation. Most fortunately more complete reports and later explanations took the edge off what had seemed to be a sudden and serious decision.

The importance of decision to use the atomic bomb was recognized by all Senators and Representatives interviewed. The opinions ranged all the way from dropping one now on the Kremlin to reserving its use for only very desperate situations. My own position was correctly reported in the news in the statement that "I would favor using it against the Chinese invaders only if the United Nations Assembly should order and approve of it." I want to amplify this point of view in a very few words. I will, however, say that I would not now use the word "order," but would leave in the word "approve."

The decision as to using the bomb is by law in the hands of the President. We must clear in our own minds that his decision will not be made solely by virtue of his office as Commander in Chief of our military forces but by virtue of his office as the President of this great Nation, and keeping in view all of its responsibilities and relations with the rest of the world. The decision as to whether to use the bomb is more than a military question and must not be decided on purely military grounds. The question of "whether" is in the hands of the President as a civil authority. Only the questions of "when" and "how" are military questions, if the "whether" has been decided affirmatively.

The importance of moral and political considerations is emphasized by the consternation in Europe over the first incorrect report of the news. The teeming cities of western Europe are interested parties in the determination, for they lie within easy range of the entrenched citadel of aggression in Moscow. It is this consideration which leads to urging that this be made a matter of United Nations policy rather than taking the full responsibility ourselves.

We have, indeed, to decide as to whether this conflict in Korea is in reality a United Nations undertaking or is so in form only. If the latter is the case, then we must be prepared to run the world alone on our own resources, on our own responsibilities, with our own treasure, and with the unsupported lives of our own young men. If, however, this is really a United Nations undertaking, most certainly so serious a decision as to the use of the bomb must have United Nations support. Fortunately, action on a question of this sort cannot be vetoed by Russia and its satellites if the Assembly has given consideration and made a recommendation.

This reference to and abiding by United Nations decision is, it would seem to me, a matter of proper foresight. We have hindsight as well to support making the United Nations authority real and effective.

Proposals were made for a neutral zone on the boundary between North Korea and Manchuria. Purely military consideration cast that proposal aside and our forces reached the Yalu River. If the news reports are to be believed, both England and France strongly favored withholding military action well short of the boundary river. We could have done so in selected defensible positions and at the same time left less excuse even than now exists for the attack from Manchuria. We would have been better off militarily and politically as well. United Nations consultation would have saved us much.

The moral, to my mind, is that there is a large area in which military tactics and strategy must be subordinated to wise statesmanship, if such can be found within our own State Department or within the combined wisdom of the United Nations.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I am reminded of the ancient adage that "a philosopher is one who can endure with equanimity the ills of others." From the safe security of the Vermont hills, I fear that the Senator from Vermont does not sufficiently appreciate the position of the 100,000 American boys now in the hills of North Korea, who are there certainly through no fault or responsibiilty of their own, and who are now faced with a Chinese horde pouring over them, and apparently are denied the use of the one weapon which might possibly be of some avail in saving the lives of thousands of those boys between now and Christmas, if authority were given to the military commander on the spot to exercise his own sound military judgment.

As the Senator from Vermont knows, the Senator from Maine suggested some time ago that in his judgment the President should exercise his authority, for undoubtedly the matter is within his discretion, to permit General MacArthur, who is in command of what are curiously termed the United Nations forces, although, outside of our South Korean allies, approximately 99 44/100 percent of them are American forces, to use the atom bomb if in his military judgment at any time it should be deemed expedient to do so.

It occurs to the Senator from Maine that it is possible that General MacArthur, who is on the spot, with the great responsibility he carries, is in a better position to determine the military problems involved.

As to the diplomatic problems involved, it is difficult to be patient with the continuing discussions at Lake Success and the United Nations, with the very men who are now responsible for the Chinese hordes pouring over the line from the safe sanctuary of Manchuria while Communists carry on a filibuster in the United Nations, with American boys dying while they talk.

The overwhelming response of the people of this country, judging from the telegrams and letters that are pouring into Washington, particularly those coming from the mothers of the boys who are now involved, and I refer particularly to the messages which are coming over my desk and over the desks of other Senators, are sufficient indication that the people of this country are becoming exceedingly impatient with these dilatory tactics while our boys are being sacrificed and crucified. It seems to me that the United Nations, in justice to its own existence and also in justice to the very great concern for the continued successful functioning of the United Nations which the Senator from Maine shares with the Senator from Vermont, and has done so for the past 30 years, since the time when, as a young man, fresh from the First World War, I organized in Maine the League to Enforce Peace, hoping and looking fondly forward to the day when an association of the nations might carry out these responsibilities. However, what do we see now? We see the solemn farce and travesty occurring in the United Nations. Even the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times, which are not susceptible of charges of being isolationist or reexaminist, have recently pronounced in their editorials that the salvation not only of our own boys but of all our trained military personnel that is involved in the situation in North Korea today, requires a prompt end of the dilatory tactics of the diplomats in the United Nations or requires the United States to consider its responsibility to our own sons. After all, Mr. President, the British boys are not dying in any numbers; the French are not; all the others concerned are not; it is the American boys who are dying.

Meanwhile the only groups who have shown a readiness to cooperate—the Chinese Nationalists—we must not consider the use of. Why not permit the Chinese Nationalists, the Japanese, the Spanish, or the Germans to help us if they wish.

What is this strange mesmerism which has descended on the people of the world, this mesmerism created by a miasma of misrepresentation and deceit?

Why this distrust of Americans in positions of military authority—a fear by other Americans to entrust them with the welfare of American boys and the use of every weapon which may help the situation? I prefer to entrust their care in the hands and in the judgment of General MacArthur. Meanwhile not only the present force, but the nucleus of any future force which we may hope to create may be wiped out unless the Chinese attacks are brought to an early halt.

Meanwhile Chinese Communists with their hands red with the blood of our American boys, continue to be received with flowers in New York and hold up the proceedings at the United Nations while their stooges murder American boys. Bear in mind there is no declaration of war and none of the rights of war apply; yet we treat them more gently and more considerately than we did the Japanese civilians at Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

How long does it seem possible that this situation can continue, while we here in the safe security of Washington or the nations of Europe deliberate as to whether or not it may be morally wise?

Our boys who lie under white crosses in Korea are not particularly concerned with the high moral consideration that agitate those who protect their murderers.

This situation is almost reminiscent of the debates which went on when gunpowder was discovered, the debates occurring in the days of chivalry as to whether it was wise and proper protocol to use a gun.

Mr. President, the atom bomb has been given to America by a divine providence and that ended the Second World War. As the Senator from Vermont knows, Dr. Karl Compton, whose opinion I am sure he will respect, formerly president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and one of the great scientists of this country, has indicated grave doubts as to whether Russia now has the atom bomb. However, we must believe that the Russians have it—for the purpose of creating fear—fear of the Chinese, fear of the Russians, fear of the atom bomb, fear of everything. The one thing they seem to be generating in this country is that Americans in this day and generation must be afraid. I think General MacArthur has spoken a profound and pertinent truth when he said that the only thing the Orient recognizes is firmness and consistency. That is the only thing they respect, rather than the pusillanimous words we heard from our Secretary of State the other evening, words that aroused the entire country with apprehension and concern not only because of the literary essay on the six points we might adopt but also because of the weakness in delivery which caused consternation in the hearts of millions of Americans, as our mail abundantly reveals.

This is why I hope the Senator from Vermont may give further consideration to this matter, and not be willing to tie the hands of America, or of our President, or paralyze America in this period of crisis. I understood the President in his statement yesterday to say that since the responsibility for using the atom bomb had been entrusted by the Congress to his care, he—and by implication no one else—would exercise that responsibility. How can the President abdicate the responsibility that is so obviously his?

If the day has arrived when American boys must die while the United Nations debate as to whether we should use the atom bomb, I think it is a sorry day in American history; and I think the United Nations may be pronouncing their own doom if this travesty continues very much longer to prevail.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I join the Senator from Maine in his feeling of distress over the plight in which the men we have in Korea find themselves; but I am also concerned about the next 100,000, and the next 100,000, and the next 100,000, and the next 100,000, and the next 100,000, and the next 100,000. I am concerned about them. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that he look a little further ahead than merely to the initial advantage possibly to be gained by the dropping of the atomic bomb on one very small section of the teeming millions of China.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLANDERS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would the Senator from Vermont have more confidence in the judgment of General MacArthur on that score than in that of those who are much farther removed from the scene of conflict? That has been my only suggestion.

Mr. FLANDERS. Yes; that was the suggestion. It was my point of view that there should go along with that the question as to the ultimate results, aside from immediate military results which General MacArthur is well qualified to decide. However, the question is one of much greater range and greater importance than immediate military results.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I have just had the pleasure and privilege of conferring with the majority leader. I understand that if the situation works out according to the satisfaction of the majority and the minority, on Monday we shall vote on the rent-control joint resolution; in fact, I have been advised to that effect.

Of course, Mr. President, we are somewhat disturbed about the situation in connection with the rent-control joint resolution, because I was advised by the clerk of the committee and by others that the Printing Office would not have the printed hearings ready until Monday. It is true that at the hearings we heard only Government witnesses, but the hearings covered quite some time.

Of course, a great deal of restricted information was placed in the record; and later much of that information had to be deleted by the Air Force, the Navy, and the Army. That restricted information showed in detail the growth of the various military installations in the United States during the first quarter of this fiscal year, as I recall. If that restricted information were printed it might be of some benefit to the enemy. Of course, the members of the committee immediately agreed to have such testimony deleted from the printed hearings, and all of it was deleted. That resulted in delay in the printing of the hearings. Therefore, the printed hearings will not be available here until Monday.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Was there any division in the committee with respect to the joint resolution?

Mr. MAYBANK. The vote was 10 for, 2 against, with 1 member voting present.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator anticipate that there will be long debate about the extension for 2 months?

Mr. MAYBANK. I cannot speak for other Senators, but I will say to my good friend the Senator from Wyoming that I anticipate there will be some debate, for the reason that when the last rent-control resolution was adopted it was distinctly understood that it would be the last extension. At that time we passed a joint resolution extending rent control for 6 months, and gave the local municipalities the right to continue it for 6 months more. I have before me figures as to what happened, though I do not intend to read them. About 800 municipalities voted to extend Federal rent control through June 30, 1951, while about 1,700 with populations of 1,000 or more, including some near the majority leader's city of Chicago, did not vote. Cincinnati did not vote, nor did Kansas City, Mo.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is it not apparent to all concerned that conditions have been completely revolutionized from what they were when the Rent Control Act was last extended?

Mr. MAYBANK. I will say to my good friend from Wyoming that there is no Member of the Senate to whom that is not apparent; but there are some 1,700 communities to whom it is not apparent, as evidenced by the fact that they have done nothing about it, which to me is certainly a clear indication.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is it the opinion of the Senator that the joint resolution should pass?

Mr. MAYBANK. I shall of course support it, as I supported and voted for it in committee. At the time of the last extension of Federal rent-control I stated on the floor that it would be the last. As the Senator from Wyoming recalls, there was in existence at that time practically no other control bill. Since that time, and in September of this year, we passed a control bill giving the President broad power over wages, prices, and materials, and other powers of stabilization.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. What I am trying to determine by these questions, of course, is whether there is any likelihood that there will be protracted debate upon the rent-control joint resolution. It seems to me that it should pass almost without discussion.

Mr. MAYBANK. Of course, I am hopeful that the Senator is correct in his opinion, because I am in charge of the joint resolution, thanks to the majority party and the kindnesses which have been shown me by that party.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. What majority party?

Mr. MAYBANK. The Democratic Party. What party would the Senator imagine? [Laughter].

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am not altogether certain, from what has been transpiring upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. MAYBANK. I do not know about that. The Democratic Party is the States' rights party of America. We are for States' rights, not Territorial rights.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That, of course, is one reason why I am advocating the statehood bill now being debated.

Mr. MAYBANK. I trust the Senator from Wyoming will go along with us on certain of our States' rights measures. I say that facetiously.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me ask another question. Am I correct in understanding that the Senator is not going to bring up the joint resolution until Monday?

Mr. MAYBANK. I do not intend to ask that it be considered before Monday. I conferred this morning with the majority leader. He thought we might take it up Monday, depending upon our progress on other matters. He gave me no assurance. I can only say to the Senator that the hearings will not be available in printed form until Monday, by reason of a delay in getting the hearings printed because of the elimination from the hearings of certain restricted information.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator from South Carolina have any idea that we can clear the way for a consideration of the rent-control resolution by voting today to take up the statehood bill? If we should take up the statehood bill, I, of course, would be the first to ask that it be temporarily laid aside in order to pass the rent-control measure.

Mr. MAYBANK. I could not answer that question. As the Senator knows, there was objection yesterday to considering the railroad labor bill, because of the likelihood that an FEPC amendment would be offered to it. There was also objection to voting Monday on the motion to take up the Alaska statehood bill.

All I have with me now is the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency, approved by a vote of 10 to 2, reporting a joint resolution which would extend rent control for 2 months. The subject may be studied further, in view of the tragedies which, as the Senator has said, have befallen the American people since the passage of the last rent-control bill. I refer particularly to the tragedies which have befallen our soldiers, sailors, and marines in Korea.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say to the Senator that we ought to pass the joint resolution without delay. We ought to pass appropriation bills without delay. We ought to pass without delay every single bill which Senators may present with respect to national defense. That includes statehood bills, which, in my judgment, are at this time fundamental to the national defense.

Mr. MAYBANK. I want to say that not once have I voted against a national defense measure.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I realize that.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator from Wyoming has joined with me, as has the Senator from Nebraska, on legislation regarding stockpiling, atomic energy, and everything else connected with national defense. So long as I remain in the Senate I shall vote for everything that may be in the interest of the national defense.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I know the Senator will.

Mr. MAYBANK. But I disagree with the Senator about the relationship of the Alaska statehood bill to national defense. I do not go along with him on that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall demonstrate the relationship.

Mr. MAYBANK. There is a difference of opinion between us on that one matter, but on all other matters we join hands.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. With respect to the rent-control measure, so far as the majority is concerned, particularly Senators who are vitally interested in it, we are ready to consider it at any time. I think we might take it up and pass it this afternoon.

Mr. MAYBANK. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the only difficulty is that the hearings have not yet been printed. So far as I know, it would be rather unprecedented if the Senate felt that we should take up the bill without the report and the hearings.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator from Wyoming. I do not think there is going to be very much trouble on the question of a 60-day extension.

Mr. MAYBANK. I hope there will not be.

Mr. LUCAS. I regret that it is not 90 days. I cannot anticipate what the new Congress will do, but I feel sure that next year we shall have not only rent control but a number of other controls.

Mr. MAYBANK. I thoroughly agree with the distinguished Senator from Illinois. If the House passes a 90-day extension and we pass a 60-day extension, the difference can be adjusted in conference and probably a satisfactory agreement can be reached. In the meantime, we are going to have additional controls. The reason I suggested taking up the rent-control joint resolution on Monday was that some of the testimony shows the need for the controls. I may say to the majority leader that the Banking and Currency Committee plans to meet on Monday at 10:30 in an open hearing, of which notice has been given, to hear the testimony of Mr. Alan Valentine, the Economic Stabilization Administrator. We are planning to devote all of Monday to that testimony. He will be the principal witness. On Tuesday we are going to meet with Michael DiSalle, who has been nominated to be Director of Price Stabilization. He is the mayor of Toledo. This indicates that we have not been deliberately trying to limit the time needed for proper consideration of the matter. But it is not for me, as one of 96 Senators, to rise and say that there will be no debate on the question. We have had excellent cooperation, I may say, from both Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I sincerely hope that the report will be ready by Monday, in order that we may be able to take up the joint resolution at that time.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I thank my good friend from Illinois. What I am about to do is to read the report now, so that it will be in the RECORD where Senators may read it on Saturday. If there are any delays in the printing of the report by Monday, Senators will at least have today's RECORD and will be able to read the report. I intend to read it now.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate that very much. Certainly we ought to be able to pass the rent control resolution on Monday without any delay.

Mr. MAYBANK. I hope we shall.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I merely wish to ask the majority leader whether I am correct in understanding that on Monday he will move to make the rent control resolution the order of business?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. At 12 o'clock?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I shall read the report so that it may be printed in the RECORD and so that Senators may have an opportunity to study it over the week end. On Monday Senators will not be able to say, "We just arrived today, and the report has come in only today; we have not had an opportunity to study it." I am not accusing any Senator of having shown that disposition heretofore, but I shall read the report to prevent that situation from arising.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator can put it in the RECORD by unanimous consent. I am sure that no Senator will object.

Mr. MAYBANK. No; I prefer to read it.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a statement?

Mr. MAYBANK. I will yield for a brief statement, provided I do not thereby lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from South Carolina may yield to the Senator from Connecticut without prejudicing his right to the floor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, may I ask the majority leader another question that I have been requested to ask?

Mr. MAYBANK. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for that purpose, without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from South Carolina yields to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it the intention of the majority leader to take up any other bills of any kind this afternoon? I refer to bills that may be on the calendar. If so, what bills?

Mr. LUCAS. No; I do not believe it would be advisable to take up any other bills. There are two or three bills which are not considered important by the administration, but which are considered important by certain Senators. I am sure we can pass those without much trouble. I do not have the numbers of those bills, but I will insert them in the RECORD before I leave today, in order that Senators may know what they may anticipate following disposition of the rent-control bill. It must be apparent to all that as the result of the maneuvering of our friends who are opposed to that measure, we are not going to get a vote upon the Alaska statehood bill. Consequently, it seems to me that it would be rather futile and useless to go along listening to speeches when we may be able to transact some other business with respect to certain bills now on the calendar. Of course, the moment any measures in connection with the Korean situation, in which the White House and the administration are vitally concerned, come from the White House or from the committees, we shall immediately take them up. That includes appropriations, aid to Yugoslavia, aid to Korea, and taxes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. It is the Senator's intention to place in the RECORD this afternoon the numbers of the bills he will ask to have considered next week, and can we be sure that he will not ask that they be called up this afternoon?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator can be assured of that.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Illinois and to other Senators that I have not sacrificed the hope that there may yet be unanimous consent to vote upon the motion of the majority leader to make the statehood bill the unfinished business of the Senate. It will be my purpose, therefore, later in the day, after negotiations which are now in progress have developed a little further, to make another request for unanimous consent to vote before the middle of next week on the motion which is now pending. I am not disposed to give way upon the importance of the statehood bills. I wished to advise the Senator from Illinois and other Senators that negotiations are in progress.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, first, if I may be permitted to interrupt, I should like to concur in what the Senator from Wyoming has stated with respect to the importance of the Alaska statehood bill. The Senator from Illinois is a realist. He can see clouds on the horizon. I do not propose in this short session to continue to debate the Alaska statehood bill when other measures of importance require consideration. Of course, I should like to have my good friends from the South agree on a date on which we could vote on the motion to consider the Alaska statehood bill, as well as on a date on which we could vote on the merits of the bill. Until that can be done, I do not believe it would be the better part of wisdom to debate endlessly the Alaska statehood bill when other measures of importance await consideration. I do not believe the Senate desires to follow such a course. I hope the Senator from Wyoming will be persuasive enough to convince the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] in that respect, although the Senator from Mississippi has made very vociferous objection. I hope he will repent and give the Senator from Wyoming and other Senators interested in the statehood bill an opportunity to proceed with the statehood bill. However, he looks as determined today as he did yesterday when he made his objection. I believe he looks even more determined today. I hope I am wrong in my analysis of the Senator's appearance today, but I do not think I am wrong in that respect.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The Senator from South Carolina yielded to me about 10 minutes ago. I should like to make a short statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; if so, to whom?

Mr. MAYBANK. I shall be glad to yield to any Senator whom the Chair recognizes provided I do not lose the floor. I do not wish to stand on my feet during this colloquy, and I shall like to give Senators an opportunity to make short statements. Therefore, I shall be very glad to yield to any Senator whom the Chair recognizes, provided I do not lose the floor by so yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina that he may yield to Senators without his losing the floor? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield for a moment so that I may make a statement in reply to the question addressed to me by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not think I am unreasonable, but I cannot yield any further. I asked the Senator from South Carolina to yield to me to make a short statement. I have been waiting 10 minutes to make it. I have an engagement which I must keep. My statement will take only a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

POSSESSION OF THE ATOM BOMB BY THE SOVIET UNION

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I should like to say that twice within the past few days the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] has quoted Prof. Karl Compton's belief that the Soviet Union does not possess the atomic bomb. Similar beliefs have been expressed by other people during the past year. They would like to believe what Dr. Compton believes. I agree it is a very comforting thought. However, I think it should be stated for the RECORD that the evidence available to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, which evidence has been available to the committee for the past year, since September 23, indicates that the Soviets did explode an atomic weapon and that they are today in the business of manufacturing. I think that fact should be stated for the RECORD. I do not believe it is either wise or judicious for the Senator from Maine to send forth such information, when all the evidence in the hands of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy indicates directly to the contrary. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for one more question on procedure?

Mr. MAYBANK. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. It may be unnecessary to ask the question. However, the minority would appreciate the assurance that if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] asks for a unanimous-consent agreement on the motion to consider the Alaska statehood bill, even though it is not necessary to have a quorum call, he will nevertheless ask for a quorum call before he makes his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be happy to do so if I am not barred. I therefore ask for preliminary unanimous consent that whenever it may be possible to offer such a request for unanimous consent to vote at a time certain upon the motion of the majority leader to consider the statehood bill a quorum call may be had without respect to whether any business has been transacted since the previous quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall not object, but if I understand the rules of the Senate, before a unanimous-consent request can be submitted to the Senate, a quorum call must be had.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I did not so understand the rule on a motion to consider a bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that unless some business has been transacted, a quorum call is not mandatory. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; if so, to whom?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I believe we have before us a measure on which debate has been inadequate. I shall object, therefore, when a unanimous-consent request is made.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Wyoming asks the Senator from Mississippi if he does not think adequate debate could be obtained on the floor of the Senate after the motion to consider the bill had been agreed to?

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, if I thought so, I would not object. I do not think we have had adequate debate. I shall certainly make objection to any such unanimous-consent request.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Mississippi is now notifying the Senate and all concerned that both upon the motion to consider and upon the merits of the bill the Senator will object to any unanimous-consent request.

Mr. EASTLAND. The Senator from Mississippi is not notifying anyone on anything. He is simply replying to the question addressed to him by the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA AND HAWAII

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD at this point a telegram from the National Headquarters of the Marine Corps League, which I received, as chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. It is dated November 28, and reads:

BATON ROUGE, LA., November 28, 1950

Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
The United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

"Whereas the Marine Corps has, since the founding of the Republic, been in the vanguard of the Nation's struggle for the defense and extension of the principles of democracy; and

"Whereas the world today is in a critical struggle in the continuing conflict between freedom and tyranny and the United States as the leader of the forces of freedom has an obligation to set the most effective example of popular self-government to the peoples of the world; and

"Whereas the extension of the frontiers of our democracy can be most strikingly extended by the immediate admission of the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii into the Union of States; and

"Whereas the Senate of the United States now has before it for consideration bills for the admission of Alaska and Hawaii which have been enacted by the House of Representatives and which have received the overwhelming endorsement of the appropriate committee of the Senate; and

"Whereas the peoples of these Territories have voted for statehood and the opinion of the peoples of these Territories have voted for statehood and the opinion of the people of the Nation is preponderantly in favor of immediate admission of Alaska and Hawaii: and

"Whereas it has been demonstrated and proved that these Territories have met and surpassed all constitutional and reasonable qualifications for admission; and

"Whereas these Territories have long been valued possessions of these United States, and the people thereof in times of both peace and war have demonstrated their loyalty, their spirit of self-sacrifice, their trustworthiness, and their abilities to be good citizens; and

"Whereas the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii are important outposts in the preservation of world peace and in the defense of the shores of the continental limits of these United States, and their admittance to statehood will strengthen the position of these Territories in the defense of our shores and in the maintenance of world peace: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That the national legislative officer recommend to the Congress of the United States to enact laws to the effect that the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii be granted statehood."

Resolution adopted at Marine Corps League National Convention in Washington, D. C., September 6, 1950.

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS, MARINE CORPS LEAGUE, OLD STATE CAPITOL, BATON ROUGE, LA.
By BETTY F. CONEY.

I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, as I was about to say a while ago, when, of course, I yielded to first one Senator and then another who had important observations to make, I did not have the opportunity fully to explain that the rent-control joint resolution is to me rather embarrassing, because last year when we brought the rent-control resolution before the Senate I stated that that would be the last one. I said that, Mr. President, and it is in the RECORD, in connection with the measure then passed in which certain powers of extension were provided, advantage of which was taken by some communities and not by others.

The reason why I have changed my position is that a dreadful war has come upon our people since that statement of mine, and in the meantime the President has appointed officials to take charge of types of control other than rent control. It is my judgment that we are going to be in a more and more controlled economy as time goes on. So I had to alter my position, because of the misfortunes of our soldiers, our sailors, and our marines, and because of the tragedy of the Korean situation which arose last summer.

Mr. President, I again desire to say that while I was embarrassed, my country and its people always come first. It was for that reason that I introduced the joint resolution calling for a 60-day extension, so that the New Congress could look over the situation and write whatever law Congress deemed to be necessary to cover Federal control of rents after the first of March.

The impact of the war economy, and of the orders to be issued by those in charge, as appears in the testimony, for instance, of Chairman Symington, will not be reached, probably, until April of next year. As we continue approaching that time, with the inflationary trend, with the scarcity of some goods, and like conditions, it is going to be essential to place controls on strategic materials, and if necessary to enact stronger laws against hoarding and profiteering.

Mr. President, I understand that the President of the United States today asked the Committee on Appropriations, for an additional $16,800,000,000, plus over a billion dollars for atomic energy development, making about $18,000,000,000 the President has asked for since he called for the deficiency appropriations last September and October.

Mr. President, I am now going to take the liberty of reading the report of the committee on Senate Joint Resolution 207:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the joint resolution do pass.

Mr. President, the vote was 10 for the 60-day extension, 2 opposed, and 1 member voted "present."

The report continues:

On June 23, 1950, the President approved Public Law 574, the Housing and Rent Act of 1950. In general this was a decontrol act looking toward the complete lifting of Federal rent controls by December 31, 1950. * * *

At that time, in June, that was what I hoped would be done, and that is why I said I did not expect another rent-control-extension measure. I think every Senator knows, yes, every American knows, that since June 23, 1950, there have been many changes in the economy of this country, as well as tragic changes involving war.

The report continues:

In general this was a decontrol act looking toward the complete lifting of Federal rent controls by December 31, 1950, except in those areas where affirmative action should be taken by local governing bodies to extend such controls through June 30, 1951. Two days later—on June 25, 1950, North Korean aggression against the Republic of Korea commenced with a southward crossing of the thirty-eighth parallel.

Just think of it, just 2 days later—

We passed the bill which became Public Law 574, it went to conference, the President signed it on June 23, 1950, and on June 25 the North Koreans advanced. That is another reason why I wish to make the RECORD perfectly clear as to why I introduced the measure for a 60-day extension. It is because we are living in a different world in December 1950 from that which existed in May and June 1950 when we looked forward to a peacetime economy and passed Public Law 574 in order to encourage those interested in building to erect more houses.

I continue reading from the report:

Subsequent events have led to a drastic change in conditions which existed at the time the Housing and Rent Act of 1950 was framed and adopted. The Nation entered upon a program to bolster the national security, the full impact of which on the economy will probably not be felt until next spring.

Mr. President, I use the term "next spring," because those who are supposed to be familiar with conditions and know the plans of the Government realize that the impact has not affected our people as yet. It has affected them somewhat, but not to the extent it will affect them by spring of next year, through defense preparations and controls other than rent controls.

The report continues:

The shifting about of people in defense work and in the Armed Forces may be expected to increase as the preparedness program is stepped up. Coupled with a decrease in the recently high rate of construction of civilian housing, this situation has caused and will increasingly cause an inadequacy in the supply of housing to meet the demand in certain areas.

Your committee is of the opinion that there is not sufficient time in the remaining few weeks before the convening of the Eighty-second Congress to hold public hearings and discuss adequately the need for framing rent-control legislation properly designed to meet the new conditions growing out of the Korean developments.

I agree with what the majority leader said, that probably we will pass another rent-control bill next year. What sort of bill we will have to pass I do not know. What sort of bill the Senate and the House will determine upon I do not know. That is not up to me. But, as I see the situation, with the curtailment of the building of houses, with more strategic materials being controlled, a bill will have to be passed, not to control or decontrol rents in places like Miami Beach, Tucson, Ariz., or other places if they are used only as pleasure resorts, but in places to which people are being shifted due to the defense program. The Army says they will reach a peak of 2,700,000 troops, and the families of those troops must be housed properly.

The report continues:

That is a problem which will undoubtedly demand the early attention of the Eighty-second Congress. After reviewing the facts presented to it by Chairman W. Stuart Symington, of the National Security Resources Board; Assistant Secretary of the Air Force Eugene Zuckert, testifying on behalf of the Secretary of Defense; and Housing Expediter Tighe E. Woods, your committee was reluctant to let Federal rent controls lapse completely on December 31, 1950, except in those areas where local action is taken to continue controls through June 30, 1951. Several communities have expressed the idea that the rent-control problems confronting the country are national in scope and require Federal action, not merely a patchwork quilt of controls determined by the local action of Government bodies. Those who would be immediately affected by the increased rents—the military and the defense workers—would in most cases have no voice on the local governing body, and thus, naturally, look to the Federal Government to maintain reasonable rentals.

I again call attention to the fact that I believe it to be the duty of the Federal Government, when we shift them, to give some protection to the military and to defense workers, although I do not believe it is the duty of the Federal Government to control rents alone. Many things will have to be controlled. The Government will have to prevent hoarding, and while we are in process of doing all that, the extension of the rent-control legislation is the better part of wisdom.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. CAIN. I have curiosity about one very serious matter which I think the Senator from South Carolina can satisfy. As a result of the passage of the act to which the Senator has just referred, the State of New York got out from under Federal rent controls—passed, approved, and put into effect the operation of its own State system of controls. I only know from what little I have read on that question that New York State is pretty well in agreement that they would ever so much rather, if rent controls be required, have the rents controlled and operated and supervised under State authority than Federal authority.

Mr. MAYBANK. I believe that is the way the matter should be handled; but the other States have not done it. I take my hat off to New York for doing it, as well as to Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and the other cities, such as Chicago, where those favoring such action at least went to the city councils and stood up and voted and were counted.

Mr. CAIN. I ask the question because I was inclined to infer from what the Senator from South Carolina has recently said that in the next session of the Congress it is likely that a Federal rent-control law will be passed which will bring New York State within the jurisdiction of that act, and if there is any such likelihood, I think now is the time to suggest to New York State that what they have but so recently done and agreed upon is likely to be undone in the very near future.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, of course I would not be one to make any suggestion to New York State. I do not want someone from New York to suggest anything for South Carolina. I can say to the Senator from Washington that the matter has been under study by Governor Dewey, and distinguished representatives from New York, including the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], who has been associated with Governor Dewey, and is a most competent and able member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. He should be able to explain the matter to our committee, and I certainly rely upon his judgment.

Mr. CAIN. The general subject of rent controls is a difficult one.

Mr. MAYBANK. It is very difficult, and I do not know what the Congress is going to do. The Senator does not know what is going to happen. Let us hope and pray with all our hearts that the Russian and the Chinese situations will become better. But if they become worse, I do not know what kind of a law we will have. I think we will need some law which will affect the soldiers and sailors and marines and the defense workers who will be shifted from one community to another. Perhaps 7,000,000 persons are going to be moved.

Mr. CAIN. All I know is that our country, to which we are all deeply devoted, is in quite a sad dilemma. Therefore, if it be true, and the hearings held by the Senator's committee should so determine, that New York State has effectively and fairly and adequately administered rent controls within the jurisdiction of that State, I should like to think that the committee would encourage other States to do likewise in order that Uncle Sam would be as little burdened as possible.

Mr. MAYBANK. I may say to the Senator from Washington that if it were found that the situation with respect to the State of New York was satisfactory, and that the law was functioning well, I would be the first person to join in asking other States to do the same thing, if at the same time in some way exemptions could be granted, such as the exemptions with respect to New York and Chicago in the case of hotels. The Senator remembers those exemptions.

Mr. CAIN. Yes, indeed I do.

Mr. MAYBANK. I would be in favor of such a program, if it could be worked out. I would not be in favor of the Federal Government taking over any controls except in the interest of national defense.

Mr. CAIN. Even in the interest or name of the national defense, we ought to believe that every municipality and every State should first do all it could, before requiring any assistance either in the field or controlling rents or any other enterprise and, before seeking relief or assistance or leadership from the Federal Government.

Mr. MAYBANK. I am in thorough accord with the Senator that States ought to do what they can to help meet problems such as this.

Mr. CAIN. I know the Senator is, and I know he will not take exception to my raising one or two questions.

Mr. MAYBANK. No. The New York law has apparently been working satisfactorily. When the committee holds hearings on the proposed new law I shall rely on the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], as well as on the Senator from Washington, who was formerly a member of the committee. If a satisfactory agreement can be reached to exempt New York City and other cities and still accomplish the purposes of the legislation, I shall be glad to vote for it. As the Senator from Washington knows, in 1949, when we exempted even the largest cities, Chicago and New York, with respect to hotels for transients, I voted for that exemption.

Mr. CAIN. Yes. I think it is a fair thing to say to the Senator from South Carolina, particularly in his capacity as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, that the junior Senator from Washington expects to oppose the joint resolution to extend the present law for a period of 60 days, and I shall oppose it for more than one reason. But one reason why I shall oppose it, which is not to say that I shall endeavor unduly to take the time of the Senate, is that in my view, if there be a Federal rent-control law in the future coming out of the war situation and full mobilization, it will obviously bear no similarity to the prevailing law.

Mr. MAYBANK. In my opinion the Senator is correct.

Mr. CAIN. It would then seem to me to be the wise thing to do to let the law of the land take its own course. The prevailing rent law is to expire on the 31st day of December 1950. The new Congress can then begin all over again to deal with the subject.

We are going to need a new piece of machinery. Certainly, in my judgment, we will require a new set of managers. It is to some extent, indeed, largely for that reason, that I should think the present law ought to expire, in order that we may completely clear the decks and give to the new Congress a complete freedom of action.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I am not going to argue that point. Considerable argument could take place on both sides of the question. I will say, however, that shortly after the Korean incident began last summer, and when the Defense Production Act was under consideration, there was considerable agitation, and some requests made, for the inclusion in it of rent control. I said at that time that we then had in effect the present rent-control law, and that I did not think a new provision with respect to rent control belonged in the Defense Production Act. I do not know whether that question was voted on in committee. It was discussed, however, at quite some length, and I opposed the proposal to include rent control in the Defense Production Act.

Mr. CAIN. I wanted to tell the Senator from South Carolina where the Senator from Washington stands, and to be so bold as to suggest one or two items I wanted to draw to the Senator's attention.

Mr. MAYBANK. I appreciate the boldness of the Senator from Washington. While we do not always agree, I have only the highest regard and respect for the Senator from Washington.

Mr. CAIN. I appreciate the Senator's comment.

Mr. MAYBANK. I continue to read from the report of the committee:

> Your committee received testimony from the Housing Expediter that as of November 27, 1950, there were 1,703 incorporated places with a 1950 population of 1,000 or more which had not taken affirmative action to continue rent controls beyond the end of this year. Yet, in many of the same areas it has been and will continue to be necessary to house many more people due to an increase in defense production or activation of military establishments after December 31, 1950. However, plans for future actions such as these which cause an impact on local rental situations may well be presently unknown to the local governing bodies in those areas, possibly for security reasons.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask another question?

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. CAIN. I listened to the Senator's reading of the last sentence, from which I understood that more than 1,000 communities have not by affirmative action said they wanted the Federal rent-control law continued from December 31 of this year to June 30 of next year.

Mr. MAYBANK. Positive action has not been taken in 1,703 communities having a population of 1,000 and over.

Mr. CAIN. I understand. The committee report says that in some of these communities there will be an added population as the result of incoming war workers.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes. Mr. Zuckert made a statement respecting that situation which he asked be eliminated from the RECORD for security reasons. But I mention one instance which has appeared in the newspapers. It deals with Camp Leonard Wood in Missouri. A great number of persons were moved there. They have asked for the reimposition of rent control there.

Mr. CAIN. We start out with over a thousand communities. By way of argument I will certainly assume that if our war situation becomes more complex and complicated, some among those communities will substantially increase in population.

Mr. MAYBANK. I have seen figures on that point, and I will say the Senator is correct.

Mr. CAIN. But is not the reverse also true, that among those thousand-odd communities there will be of necessity a good many communities whose population will decrease?

Mr. MAYBANK. That is true. In such cases the city councils could vote to remove rent control. I agree with the Senator's statement that in many places the population will increase, and in others will decrease.

Mr. CAIN. I am talking about a possible new law, and my hope is that the committee itself would take every conceivable step to see that controls were not imposed upon American communities where there was no need for such controls, and where it was a proven, established fact, that population had decreased.

Mr. MAYBANK. I will say I am always prayerful that the present situation will change. But if it does not, I will say to the Senator from Washington that we will hold extensive hearings, and give both proponents and opponents of the proposed new rent measure an opportunity to be heard. The Senator remembers that last year I worked on the problem day and night, and the Senator from Washington joined in that work.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington had a very happy time in doing so.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator was a member of the comimttee last year when we rewrote the bill many times.

Mr. CAIN. And as a member of the Senator's committee I was partly critical of what was then the present rent law of the land, because it unnecessarily continued to impose controls on American cities when those wartime controls had long since outlived their usefulness.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is correct; and I voted in favor of permitting communities who wished to do so to get out from under the law.

Mr. CAIN. That, I think, was one of the fairest and most reasonable and most intelligent steps that was ever taken with reference to this subject.

Mr. MAYBANK. Of course, the city councils of cities in the State of Washington, in the State of Utah, in the State of California, in the State of South Carolina, and in all other States, know more about their own problems than do persons who are in Washington.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from South Carolina and I are in complete agreement on that point. One thing I have never been able to understand is how it could possibly be construed that the Federal Government in Washington, D. C., could be more highly competent or qualified to determine the need, or lack of need, for rent controls, as, for example, in Seattle, in the State of Washington, than are those responsible for the management of that city or its city council. Whatever happens, I hope we may give every ounce of jurisdiction and responsibility possible to the local city councils and to the State establishments.

Mr. MAYBANK. The mayors of the cities of a State and the Governor of the State should know more about conditions in that State than Members of the United States Senate. That is the way I look at it.

Mr. CAIN. As one who shares a background comparable to that of the Senator from South Carolina, I have felt, and often said to many of those who used to be my colleagues and continue to be my friends, that "the bulk of the responsibility for a continuing Federal rent-control law lies upon your heads because of your unwillingness in many instances to acknowledge and to wish to take over your responsibility for running the affairs of your community." I can only wish that all the mayors of today share that view, as apparently some do not.

Mr. MAYBANK. I am sorry some of them do not. But many of them are going to be present here on Monday and Tuesday. I know the former mayor of Seattle is going to be here.

I read further from the report of the committee:

> Without a clear knowledge of these conditions, it is difficult for local governing bodies to act wisely in the national interest. National problems require national action. Indeed the Housing Expediter testified that surveys revealed many employers are already experiencing difficulty in recruiting and retaining immigrant workers due to the inability of new workers to find housing. He further stated that already in military areas, commanding officers are expressing serious concern over the difficulties experienced by military personnel under their command in obtaining suitable housing.
> Today about 7,500,000 rental-housing units remain under Federal rent controls; 3,430,000 of these will stay under Federal rent controls through June 30, 1951, by virtue of the action of local governing bodies to date. This leaves about 4,000,000 units from which Federal rent controls will be removed on December 31, 1950, in the absence of affirmative action by the governing body of the local government having jurisdiction in the area where the units are located. It is primarily these approximately 4,000,000 units which will be affected by this joint resolution. The fact that these governing bodies have not seen fit to remove the units from Federal rent controls indicates either a tight situation in the rental market in those areas, or at best a condition where housing supply was just beginning to meet demand in the absence of the new national emergency caused by the Korean developments.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCLELLAN in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. With reference to the last sentence the Senator from South Carolina has just read, I should like to say that I do not hold it to be entirely valid, for the reason that during the last 2 months I have had an opportunity to discuss the rent-control situation with the mayors and councilmen of a number of American cities. I have often said to them, "Why have you not taken positive, affirmative action to remove your city from Federal rent-control jurisdiction?"

In many instances they have replied, "Why should we? The question is controversial; it is difficult. Why should we not rely on the law of the land which tells us that in several short months' time we will automatically be removed from rent control?" They have said, "Why should we look for a fight which can be easily"—or expediently or conveniently, if you will—"avoided by letting the law take its own course, when the law reads that on December 31 there are to be no more controls, unless they are retained by affirmative action of the local community."

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I appreciate what the Senator has said, and I think some of the communities have dodged the issue.

Yet we are told that, because of war conditions, it will be February before adequate findings can be made regarding new rent-control legislation. Meanwhile, something must be done to provide for the families of sailors and soldiers who are being sent overseas, some of them never to return.

Mr. President, a moment ago I referred to the approximately 4,000,000 units which will be affected by this joint resolution. The report continues:

> If those units were now thrown into an uncontrolled market, in view of the growing impact of the national preparedness program, excessive increases in rent would be entirely likely. Such increases followed by increased wages to enable payment of the rents would increase the cost of defense preparations and cause inflationary pressures on the national economy. As the President said in his November 27, 1950, letter to the chairman of your committee in suggesting an extension of the automatic decontrol date beyond December 31, 1950: "Unless this extension is made, many communities may be decontrolled by the operation of the present law before they, or the Congress, have been able to examine the problems confronting them, and with results that may be damaging to the national defense."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire letter the President wrote to me as chairman of the committee be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 27, 1950.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As you know, the Housing and Rent Act of 1950 will eliminate rent control in all incorporated cities, towns, and villages after December 31, 1950, unless they have taken affirmative action by that date to continue such control. I strongly recommend that the Congress extend that date to March 31, 1951. Such an extension would not interfere with the authority local communities now have to decontrol rents when in their judgment it seems proper.

The present rent control law was enacted before the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. It was passed to provide for the orderly transition to a free rental market in a peacetime economy. There has been a marked change in the situation since the law was passed. The outbreak of aggression during recent months has compelled us to move rapidly to increase our military strength. We are expanding our Army, Navy, and Air Force. We are stepping up our production of defense items and increasing our industrial capacity. To carry out this program successfully and to safeguard our economy, it will be necessary to keep rents in vital defense areas from rising to unreasonable levels.

Therefore, we must consider anew the whole problem of rent control in relation to the pressures now being created by the defense program. We must look into the situation around reactivated military camps and installations so that servicemen and their families can be given necessary protection against rent gouging. We must prevent high rents from interfering with the recruiting of defense workers and their movement to defense jobs. We must consider the relation of rent control to the price and wage aspects of our stabilization program.

I realize that there is insufficient time for the Congress to make a full investigation of these problems and consider a new rent control law during the present session. Moreover, during the next few months it should be possible to form a more accurate judgment concerning the effects of our expanded defense program on rents and housing needs. The extension of the automatic decontrol date to March 31, 1951, will permit the Eighty-second Congress to give full consideration to the effects of our defense program and make whatever changes in the law may be necessary. Unless this extension is made, many communities may be decontrolled by the operation of the present law before they, or the Congress, have been able to examine the problems confronting them, and with results that may be damaging to the national defense.

I will appreciate it if you will take this matter up with your committee with a view to obtaining favorable action upon such an extension.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Currency, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, the report continues:

This joint resolution would extend this automatic decontrol date through February 1951, from December 31, 1950. This action would not result in an across-the-board freeze of rents at the December 31, 1950, level, for the rental adjustment provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended would remain fully operative. The Housing Expediter testified that these adjustments had been substantial in number. In the first 4 months of the current fiscal year, July through October, rent increases were authorized for 418,133 rental units. This almost doubled the number for the previous 4 months, when increases were authorized for 239,236 units.

Nor would extension of the automatic decontrol date remove the authority of incorporated cities, towns, or villages or unincorporated areas of counties to remove their areas from Federal rent controls by action of their local governing bodies up to and including February 28, 1951.

Mr. President, I wish to make that point very plain, because unfortunately some Senators who have asked me about this measure have naturally not quite understood what was recommended by the committee, because they are not on the committee and we did not hold open hearings.

Our recommendation is merely to extend the present law for 60 days, so that the new Congress can make a study of the situation after the impact of war has come upon us. If the law is extended by means of this joint resolution, any town in Arkansas, Maine, California, or elsewhere in the United States which wishes to take local action to be relieved of rent control may do so; the local option will still remain. I wish to assure all Senators, particularly those who believe in States' rights, of that point.

Nor would such an extension of the automatic decontrol date authorize the Housing Expediter to bring under Federal rent control any area already or hereafter removed from the scope of Federal rent control by action of its governing body or by the legislature of the State in which it is located. Nor would such an extension empower the Housing Expediter to invoke Federal rent controls over housing accommodations whose maximum rents have been or are hereafter removed as the result of approval by the Emergency Court of Appeals of a recommendation of a local advisory board or as the result of approval by that court of a decision by the Housing Expediter to decontrol such rents.

In brief, the joint resolution is in effect merely a stop-gap measure pending the convening of the Eighty-second Congress in January. It is the present intention of your committee in the early days of that Congress to review the entire problem of Federal rent control in relation to the other measures for stabilization of the national economy, such as price and wage controls.

Under the Housing and Rent Act of 1950, all Federal rent controls would expire on December 31, 1950, except under two conditions. They would end on June 30, 1951, in any incorporated city, town, or village which (while under Federal rent controls and before December 31, 1950) declares by resolution of its governing body adopted for that purpose, or by popular referendum, in accordance with local law, that a shortage of rental housing exists requiring the continuance of rent control in that city, town, or village. Federal rent controls would likewise end on June 30, 1951, in any unincorporated locality in a defense-rental area in which one or more incorporated cities, towns, or villages constituting the major portion of that defense-rental area have made an appropriate declaration of the need for the continuance of rent control in the respective city, town, or village. For the reasons set forth herein, your committee recommends the prompt enactment of this joint resolution in order to extend from December 31, 1950, to February 28, 1951, the date for automatic decontrol of controlled housing accommodations in those communities which under existing law take no affirmative action to preserve Federal rent controls through June 30, 1951.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW

In compliance with subsection (4) of rule XXIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate, changes in existing law made by the joint resolution, as reported, are shown as follows (existing law proposed to be omitted is enclosed in black brackets):

Public Law 574, Eighty-first Congress, section 4

Section 204 (f) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(f) (1) The provisions of this title, except section 204 (a), shall cease to be in effect at the close of [December 31, 1950] February 28, 1951, except that they shall cease to be in effect at the close of June 30, 1951.

"(A) in any incorporated city, town, or village which, at a time when maximum rents under this title are in effect therein, and prior to [December 31, 1950] February 28, 1951, declares (by resolution of its governing body adopted for that purpose, or by popular referendum, in accordance with local law) that a shortage of rental housing accommodations exists which requires the continuance of rent control in such city, town, or village; and

"(B) in any unincorporated locality in a defense-rental area in which one or more incorporated cities, towns, or villages constituting the major portion of the defense-rental area have made the declaration specified in subparagraph (A) at a time when maximum rents under this title were in effect in such unincorporated locality."

I desire to thank the Chair and the other Senators for their indulgence. I merely wanted to have this report read so that it might appear in today's RECORD. We expect to have the completed hearings, of course, on Monday.

Mr. President, I have nothing further to say at this time. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] to proceed to the consideration of H. R. 331, to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am ready for a vote; but, as a matter of precaution, and more or less as a matter of notice to the Members of the Senate, I wish to place in the RECORD a list of bills which we might be able to take up at almost any time in the event the Senate finds time in the short session, or in the event we should run out of something to consider before the important measures involving the war effort come before us.

The first is Calendar No. 2540, H. R. 483, to extend the time limit within which certain suits in admiralty may be brought against the United States.

Calendar No. 2578, H. R. 9313, to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949.

Mr. AIKEN. Is that the Carolina-Virginia peanut bill?

Mr. LUCAS. No. H. R. 9313 deals with the disposal of surplus food commodities.

The next is Calendar No. 2265, H. R. 5967, to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, to clarify the status of freight forwarders and their relationship with motor common carriers.

Calendar No. 1777, H. R. 2734, to amend an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopoly, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914 (38 Stat. 730), as amended.

Calendar No. 1811, H. R. 2365, for the relief of the city of Chester, Ill.

Mr. President, those are the five measures which I am now calling to the attention of the Senate. At any time when there is a lull, after a quorum call, I may ask the Senate to consider these measures.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator mentioned bills of major importance which may be brought up. Can he identify them?

Mr. LUCAS. I refer to the appropriation bill which will come before the Senate dealing with national defense and the war effort, the appropriation bill dealing with furnishing of food to Yugoslavia, and the one dealing with food for Korea. I also refer to the tax bill. There may be other measures of importance which will have to be brought up in the next few weeks.

I do not desire to overlook the fact that the bill to amend the Railway Labor Act, S. 3295, which the Senate considered for a while, and which was the unfinished business when the Senate reconvened, also may be taken up at any time.

MARCUS WHITMAN

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington wishes to speak for a brief period about the character, capacity, and characteristics of a great American who made his contribution to progress in history more than a century ago. It would be good to have what in him was his strength, courage, and vision with us today in America, when we are so in need of guidance, inspiration, and perseverance.

Mr. President, Wednesday of this week, November 29, 1950, was a day of considerable importance in the State of Washington. November 29 was designated by Gov. Arthur B. Langlie as Marcus Whitman Day, and the occasion was properly and thoughtfully observed and recognized in each of Washington State's 39 counties.

It was on Tuesday of this week that I had been invited by telegram from some of those in authority within Washington State to address myself to the subject of Marcus Whitman. In response, I said that the situation then on the floor of the Senate did not permit discussion of any subject other than the pending business. They hoped I would be able to speak about Marcus Whitman at an early date, and it is my intention to do that now. I wish to tell a simple and magnificent story about a simple and magnificent American. I believe that Senators will agree that the precious time involved is well spent.

Because they lived and died more than a century ago it is reasonable to assume that some among us in the Senate and many living Americans have never previously heard of Marcus and Narcissa Whitman. In an address delivered in Spokane in June of this year, Dr. Chester C. Maxey, president of Whitman College, mentioned the Whitmans in the following beautiful and commemorative fashion:

> There has been no other couple like the Whitmans in American history—no wooing more strange, no wedding more extraordinary, no marriage more proof against stress and storm, no union of purpose and effort more perfect, no failure more pathetic, no ending more terrible, and no immortality more sublime than theirs. Forces they did not control or understand brought their lives together in a noble enterprise that failed; forces they did not control or understand brought their lives to a dire and agonizing close. Yet so greatly did they live, so magnificently did they labor and serve, that forces they set in motion will forever enrich the civilization they helped to plant on the western slopes of the Continental Divide.

Mr. President, the 1949 session of the Washington State Legislature by almost unanimous votes in both the Senate and House passed a bill designating Dr. Marcus Whitman as the first official representative of the State in Statuary Hall, Washington, D. C.

By act of Congress, distinguished American citizens illustrious for their historic renown or distinguished civic or military service are eligible to be so commemorated.

In authorizing the placing of the statue of Marcus Whitman in Statuary Hall, the legislature recognized the "historic renown" that has come to be associated with the story of Marcus Whitman in the more than 100 years since the tragic Whitman massacre at Waiilatpu, "the place of rye grass."

The legislation carried no appropriation, but provided for the appointment of a commission to select a sculptor, approve a statue and design and raise the necessary funds, $30,000. Parenthetically, there are no pictures of Dr. Whitman.

Gov. Arthur B. Langlie named a 12-person commission and this group, after considering proposals from 10 different sculptors, selected the statue design offered by Dr. Avard Fairbanks, dean of the College of Fine Arts, University of Utah.

People familiar with The Whitman Story have widely endorsed Dr. Fairbanks' interpretation of the man who did so much to assure the growth and development of the Pacific Northwest as a vital part of the United States.

The service to God, country, and his fellow men which marked the active career of Dr. Marcus Whitman is symbolized in this statue by Dr. Fairbanks. In his right hand, Dr. Whitman carries the Bible, which was his inspiration. In his left are plans and the saddlebags he used as "a doctor on horseback." Behind him is a representation of the rye grass from which the Indian name "Waiilatpu," the mission site, was secured.

OF HISTORIC RENOWN

In the dramatic history of the colonization and development of the Pacific Northwest, few individuals have a record of achievement as extensive or as significant as that of Dr. Marcus Whitman.

In achieving a record that made him "illustrious for (his) historic renown," Dr. Whitman's urge to action and adventure resulted in a dynamic career in the period from 1834 to 1847 that makes The Story of Marcus Whitman a colorful and dramatic chapter in western history. It is the story of—

An active and ambitious man who was the first graduate doctor of a medical school to practice west of the Rocky Mountains.

A strong and stalwart man who with Mrs. Whitman established the first American home on the Pacific coast. They were the parents of the first American white girl born west of the Rocky Mountains.

A determined and adventurous man who made one of the great rides of American history when he went 4,000 miles in the middle of winter from Waiilatpu to Washington, D. C., and Boston to plead for his mission and to tell the story of the greatness and potentialities of the Oregon Territory.

A versatile and aggressive man who brought the first wagon over the Rocky Mountains and who, in 1843, provided the leadership and guidance for the first great wagon train to come to the Oregon Territory.

A fearless and compassionate man who was massacred by an Indian's tomahawk while he was giving medical aid to those whom he came to befriend.

A dogmatic and religious man who stubbornly tried but failed in his objective of being a missionary to the Indians and to bring them to a realization of the white man's God.

Marcus Whitman was no ordinary man, but he was, instead, a man of personality and varied human characteristics. While he failed as a missionary to the Indians, he succeeded in so many other of his efforts as physician, agriculturist, explorer, and patriot that he shares fully with other illustrious citizens of the Nation the respect and admiration of those who appreciate outstanding service to God and country.

"The Story of Marcus Whitman" is indeed the story of a distinguished and important American.

THE IMPORTANT YEARS

Marcus Whitman was born in Rushville, N. Y., September 4, 1802, the son of Zeza and Alice Whitman. His father was a shoemaker and tanner and died when Marcus was 7.

After his father's death, he lived with an uncle and grandfather, both of whom were pious men and gave him constant religious care and instruction. When he was 17, he was greatly influenced by an evangelistic minister during a revival meeting and subsequently became an active church worker.

That religious activity continued during his practice of medicine, and in 1834, prompted by a desire to get into missionary work, he made application to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for duty.

The great interest of the day was in providing Christian teachers for the Indians west of the Rocky Mountains. This interest had been stimulated by an account of a visit to St. Louis of a delegation of Flathead and Nez Perce Indians seeking information about the white man's religion.

The experiences of the succeeding 25 years, including his learning to become a doctor because training to be a minister took too long and was too expensive, provided him with knowledge and qualifications for the important part that he was to play in western history.

Some of this history, Mr. President, is certain to be of more than casual or passing interest to the Senator from Montana [Mr. ECTON], who sits in the Chamber, because he, like the Senator from Washington, comes from that great area known as the western country.

In the career "to the West" that followed Dr. Whitman's decision to put his abilities to the service of Christ, episodes in 5 years were particularly outstanding and historically significant.

1835: An exploratory trip to the Northwest with the Reverend Samuel Parker to determine if missionary work was feasible among the Indians west of the Rocky Mountains. Whitman went as far west as Wyoming and then reported to the Board that a mission among the Indians of the upper Columbia River Valley was practicable.

1836: The journey to the Oregon Territory with his bride, Narcissa Prentiss, to establish the mission at Waiilatpu and to locate the first American home on the Pacific coast. There, on March 14, 1837, they became the parents of the first white girl, Alice Clarissa, born west of the Rocky Mountains.

1842–43: The ride east to save the mission and to plead the importance of the Oregon Territory. The return west to aid in bringing the first great wagon train to the rich territory and to start a new era in Oregon.

We can well afford to stop and talk about what Marcus Whitman was able to do, because he meant and was determined to do it. Think of conditions in 1842–43 in the United States of America. There were then no bicycles. There was no air traffic. There were no jet planes. There were no automobiles. A man, Marcus Whitman, 3,500 miles from this Nation's Capital, was confronted with a problem which might result in eliminating the fine work he was attempting to do in his mission, and he wanted to talk to Members of the Congress and perhaps the President about it. So Marcus Whitman set out on foot and by horseback to go 3,500 miles to save his work from ruin, and then returned 3,500 miles to put that work back together again. It is good to have an opportunity, as a citizen of the Northwest country, to speak about Marcus Whitman.

The massacre by non-Christian Cayuse Indians on November 29, 1847, ended the lives of the Whitmans and destroyed the mission which they had built and to which they had given their lives, as so many Americans of this day are going to give their lives to make certain that our Nation is not destroyed. We shall be the more successful to the degree that we have the characteristics of Marcus Whitman and his kind within us, deep down inside.

THE GOOD DOCTOR

Marcus Whitman, "the Good Doctor," is the fourth physician and surgeon to be honored with a statue in the Nation's Hall of Fame.

Kentucky recognized Dr. Ephraim McDowell—1771–1830—who performed the first ovariotomy in 1809.

Florida presented a statue of Dr. John Gorrie—1803–55—the inventor of the ice machine and mechanical refrigerator, which, at that time, he thought would only be used for fever patients.

Georgia erected a statue to Dr. Crawford W. Long—1815–78—the discoverer of ether anesthesia in 1842.

Dr. Olaf Larsell, for many years a student of Pacific Northwestern medicine, paid this tribute to Dr. Whitman:

"We behold the first American, trained as a physician, to practice his profession in the great Northwest. We see a man, respected by all, who served his fellow men, an honor to the healing art.

"In the best traditions of the country practitioner he faced danger, hardship, storm, and flood to carry healing to his patients. He made no effort to save or spare himself but gave without stint or that which he had, professional and material. From the time he first set foot in old Oregon, he was recognized as, and has been called to the present, 'the Good Doctor.'"

That title of the Good Doctor first came to Marcus Whitman in what was perhaps one of the most widely observed operations in the history of American and possibly world medicine. It occurred August 13, 1835, when Dr. Whitman removed from the back of that famous mountaineer, Jim Bridger, a 3-inch iron arrow point which had become embedded below one scapula 3 years previously in a fight with some Blackfoot Indians.

The Bridger operation was performed at the crossing of the Green River in southwest Wyoming, without help of anesthetic, and in the presence of about 2,000 Indians and 200 white trappers.

Whitman studied medicine first in Rushville, N. Y., where, as was the custom of the times, he "rode out" with an experienced doctor, observing and studying for 2 years under his supervision. In 1825 he entered Fairfield Medical School, receiving a diploma on May 9, 1826, "with the privilege of practicing physic and surgery" in New York.

Calls in his country practice in upper New York State were all made on horseback, and he carried his home-made medicines and surgical instruments in two saddlebags. His 8 years of training and practice, including another 16 weeks' course at Fairfield, made him much better qualified than the average doctor of his day.

HOMEWARD BOUND

When Marcus and Narcissa Whitman stood on the crest of the Blue Mountains, August 29, 1836, and viewed before them the wonderful valley of the Columbia River, history was made.

For the first time, the eyes of an American white woman looked upon the valley. They had started the long trek westward from Rushville, N. Y., on March 3, following the wedding of Marcus Whitman and Narcissa Prentiss in the small Presbyterian church at Angelica, N. Y., February 18.

Missionary zeal had been the basis of their betrothal and the wedding. While originally friends, they had been brought together in the common desire of missionary work by the Reverend Samuel Parker when he was going through western New York holding meetings to raise funds for the support of missions among the Indians. Marcus Whitman heard him first and besought his aid in getting an appointment, while a few days later he was heard by Narcissa Prentiss, then a 26-year-old school teacher.

The American board wanted single men or married couples, and would not accept single women. The Reverend Mr. Parker saw an opportunity, and suggested marriage to Dr. Whitman, who had told him that he might take a wife if he got an appointment to a mission. When the appointment came, in January 1835, he went to Narcissa, proposed marriage, and was accepted. She then applied to the board, and was also accepted.

When Dr. Whitman returned from his exploratory trip with Rev. Mr. Parker, who continued to the West, he went about plans for the trip to establish the missions. The Reverend and Mrs. Henry Spalding and William Gray, a layman, agreed to accompany them.

On July 4, they reached the south pass of the Rocky Mountains and crossed the Continental Divide. Their wagon, converted into a two-wheeled cart, they managed to take as far as Fort Boise, then called Snake Fort, the first wheeled vehicle to go that far west. Just out of the fort, the party separated briefly, the Whitmans going on ahead.

On September 1, they reached Fort Walla Walla, on the Columbia; and on September 12, they were guests of Dr. John McLoughlin, the Hudson's Bay Co.'s factor, at Fort Vancouver, making the trip by water. On December 10, they were in their own home, a lean-to shack at Waiilatpu, the first American white home in the Northwest.

It was here that Alice Clarissa was born March 14, her mother's twenty-ninth birthday. On June 23, 1839, the child was drowned while playing by the Walla Walla River. By then Waiilatpu had become "the cradle of the Pacific Northwest history."

THE MISSIONARY

Marcus Whitman is the seventh nationally known individual who achieved fame at least in part through religious activities, to be designated for commemoration through the placing of a statue in Statuary Hall.

California designated churchmen for both choices. One was Junipero Serra, 1713–84, missionary of the Franciscan Order, who founded nine missions. The other was Thomas Starr King, 1824–64, like Whitman, born in New York. An ordained minister, he is credited with being "the man whose matchless oratory saved California to the Union."

Pennsylvania chose J. P. G. Muhlenberg, 1746–1807. He was a distinguished minister of the gospel, a colonel in the Revolutionary War, and a member of the House of Representatives in the First, Third, and Sixth Congresses.

Rhode Island selected Roger Williams, 1609–83, an early Puritan pioneer minister of the gospel in the Colonies and among the Indians. He was famed for his zeal and ability, especially in the cause of liberty.

Utah, for its first choice, recently placed a statute of Brigham Young, in commemoration of his leading the great Mormon migration to Utah and the establishment of Salt Lake City.

Wisconsin recognized James Marquette, 1637–75, a French Jesuit priest. He was a missionary among the wild tribes of Indians of the northern country, a discoverer and explorer.

Had it not been for the fact that becoming a minister required a long and expensive period of training, Marcus Whitman would have made religion his complete career, and his story would have been much different.

Like Reverend Spalding, who came west with him in 1836, and like others who followed to work in other missions of the Northwest, Marcus Whitman's main objective was to bring religion to the Indians, and whatever other abilities he had, he felt were just to aid him in that direction.

At Waiilatpu, August 18, 1838, Whitman and Spalding led the organization of the first Protestant Church west of the Rocky Mountains. It was Presbyterian, governed on the congregational plan.

This was immediately followed by the arrival of a party of missionaries that included Mr. and Mrs. William H. Gray, Mr. and Mrs. Cushing Eells, Mr. and Mrs. Elkanah Walker, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Smith, and Cornelius Rogers.

The missionaries were people of intense convictions and strong wills. Though in hopes for their work they were as one, they soon clashed over the conduct of the missionary work. Critical letters went back to the American board; and before word could be sent that the differences had been smoothed out, a message came with a large emigrant party in 1842, ordering the closure of Waiilaptu and Lapwai, recalling Spalding, and locating the other missionaries at Tshimakain.

Reluctantly, the others agreed to a proposal by Whitman that he go east to the board to plead their case; and on October 3, 1842, he was on his way.

THE OREGON COUNTRY

Marcus Whitman, the shoemaker's son, lived in a period of American history when the still young Nation was already in the throes of an expansion that its vigorous and adventurous people required.

Accompanying that desire for increasing the physical limits of the expanding country was an almost universal and emotional reaction by the people to a deep sense of religion. Both of these characteristics took Whitman into his place in western life, without his knowing or understanding what the over-all factors were.

He moved west into a land that was virtually unknown, but in which there was a great and growing interest, and a strong degree of conflict. This was especially true of the Oregon country.

Until the treaty of 1846 finally resolved the differences of the nations that claimed the vast Oregon region and extended the boundary of the United States along the forty-ninth parallel to the Pacific Ocean, that region lying west of the Rocky Mountains and between Mexican California and Russian Alaska was in a sense no man's land.

In the succession of events leading up to that treaty, the direction and stimulus provided by Dr. Whitman and his efforts toward greater colonization and development were especially significant. English papers of the times were saying: "However the political question between England and America as to the owners of Oregon may be decided, Oregon will never be colonized overland from the Eastern States."

A treaty of joint occupancy in 1818 left the Oregon country open to nationals of the United States and Great Britain alike. In 1819, Spain gave up her claims to the region north of 42°; and by the treaties of St. Petersburg in 1824 and 1825, Russia relinquished her claims south of 54° and 40'.

American claims to the Oregon country were based upon the discovery of the Columbia River by Robert Gray—1792; the exploration of Lewis and Clark—1803–1806; establishment of fur-trading posts by Astor's Pacific Fur Co.—1811; and the relinquishment of Spanish rights to the coast north of 42 degrees by the Adams-Onis Treaty for the purchase of Florida—1819.

Control of Oregon then rested generally in the hands of the powerful British Hudson Bay Co. American traders, adventurers, and explorers, however, had developed considerable interest in the region on the part of the United States.

It was into such an era of challenging competition and action and adventure that Marcus Whitman moved with his idea that "My plans require time and distance."

WAGONS WEST

Travel under adverse circumstances that would halt a man of lesser courage was commonplace to Marcus Whitman, both in his days as a country doctor in New York, and his first years at Waiilatpu. It was well for him and for the future of the Oregon Territory that he was so capable and courageous.

The ride east on behalf of the work of the missions was taken in company with A. L. Lovejoy, a New England lawyer and recent immigrant. They left Waiilatpu on October 2, 1842, with Washington, D. C., and Boston as their objectives, undaunted by the fact that much of the trip would be made in the most severe part of the winter.

It proved to be one of the most difficult rides in American history. Unfriendly Indian tribes made it necessary to avoid South Pass and to detour southward. Near what is now Gunnison, Colo., they nearly lost their lives fording the Colorado River.

In the mountainous country near Taos their food gave out. After eating their pack mules and finally, their dogs, they were near starvation. Rescued by a party of hunters, they continued on, Dr. Whitman going ahead to Boston after short visits in Washington, D. C., with Government officials, and in New York with Horace Greeley, whom he impressed with the great potentialities of the Oregon country.

Returning West, he joined some 1,000 immigrants who assembled near Independence, Mo., to take part in what was then the largest group to attempt the trip across the Nation to Oregon. They were dubious about taking wagons all the way to the Columbia, but Whitman assured them it could be done and May 22 the trek began.

At Fort Hall, near the present Pocatello, Idaho, Hudson's Bay Co. officials advised them to leave the wagons and go by horseback, but again Whitman's advice and encouragement prevailed. He became their guide and with the knowledge gained from his own travels and what he knew had been done with wagons that had reached the Columbia in 1840, he headed the party west.

Dr. Whitman guided the wagon train from Fort Hall to the Grande Ronde River, just east of Waiilatpu, leaving in response to a message that the Spaldings were desperately ill with scarlet fever.

The significance of the 1843 immigration and the people, livestock, and equipment that came with it, was great for with it a new era dawned in Oregon. It set the precedent for the subsequent history of the Oregon Trail and made the Northwest and its resources more secure for the United States of America.

THE MASSACRE

The success which Marcus Whitman achieved as the first great farmer of the Northwest, and as the effective operator of a service center for emigrants moving into the Oregon Territory, contributed to a substantial degree to the tragic end of his mission.

He had erred at the outset in deciding to settle among the Cayuse tribe, against the advice of the more friendly Nez Perce. He had his plans and reasons, however, and it seemed to him that Waiilatpu was a logical place for the headquarters of a chain of missions.

Whitman excelled in development of the resources of the soil. So much so, in fact, that as the settlers came into the Territory they found such an evidence of abundance that word went back East that here indeed was the land of opportunity.

With the way opened to wagon traffic through the 1843 immigration in which Dr. Whitman was a key figure, homeseekers literally poured into the country. After 1844 most sought a shorter route to the south and Waiilatpu lost some of its activity.

The lessening activity was not enough to allay the reviving fears of the Indians, who had become less and less peaceful after 1840.

A severe winter in 1846–47 resulted in the loss of many Indians' horses, rousing their discontent. The 1847 immigration brought with it a particularly virulent form of measles and dysentery which hit Indians and whites alike. Dr. Whitman did his best to minister to the sick, but the Indians could not understand why he cured so many of the whites while his Indian patients usually died. Their habit of taking hot steam baths and then of jumping into the cold river probably killed many who might have survived otherwise.

Treacherous statements by half-breed Joe Lewis that Dr. Whitman, the successful farmer, was poisoning the Indians in order that he might have their lands increased their suspicions. They had debated killing him in 1844 after Elijah, the son of the Walla Walla chief, Peupeumoxmox, had been murdered by a white man.

The Indian tribal custom called for someone of equal rank among a murderer's people to be marked for death. In the 1847 treachery, however, it was the Indian belief that a "tewat" or medicine man had to be killed to cure a person poisoned by a "tewat."

About 2 o'clock the afternoon of November 29, 1847, Dr. Whitman was called to the door by an Indian request for medicine. He was struck from behind by a tomahawk and the attack against the virtually helpless whites was on. Before the assault ended, 13 had been killed, Mrs. Whitman being the only woman victim.

With the massacre, Waiilatpu became a memorial to its martyred missionaries, and has properly remained so to this day.

Mr. President, if the junior Senator from Washington understands in part the future which lies before all of us, it will be very largely filled and our time occupied, both within the Senate and in the case of all citizens throughout the land, by nothing less than a great deal of blood, a great deal of sweat, and a flood of human tears. I think that is mostly what we shall be able to look forward to for a long time to come.

As I have been privileged this afternoon to recite a few of what I consider to be the facts surrounding the life of Marcus Whitman in our great Northwest, I have derived a sense of satisfaction and encouragement from a man who in the past helped build America.

He dealt, as we of this generation must, with blood and sweat and tears. The results of the suffering of Marcus Whitman and his death gave to America a great and promising new frontier across the Nation. I join with many others in feeling that out of the blood, sweat, and tears of this generation we perhaps shall be able to provide for succeeding generations in the distant future a civilization at peace, a civilization that will be worth living in. I am not prepared to say when the State of Washington will officially send the statue of Marcus Whitman to the Capitol, to take its glorious place in Statuary Hall, but for the benefit of those among my constituents who are keenly interested in the matter, I should like to tell them in whose company Marcus Whitman will stand. As of the last reading, 74 statues have been contributed by 40 American States to Statuary Hall, which is but a few feet from where we sit and from where I speak this afternoon. Of those, 70 represent two statues received from each of 35 States. Four States, Minnesota, Arizona, South Dakota, and Louisiana, have contributed but one statue each. The nine States not thus far represented are Colorado, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, Washington, Wyoming, and Utah.

Mr. President, whenever I have an opportunity, I go to Statuary Hall to look at those men from out of the past and from States other than the State of Washington, to understand, if I can, what nature of men it was who built the great opportunity which was given to us by those who went before. How happy I shall be to know that Marcus Whitman, from my own State of Washington, will shortly join other pioneers and builders of days gone by. I desire to read these names as rapidly but as thoughtfully as I can, in bringing to a close this record and this brief treatment of the fullness of a man's life:

John Winthrop, Massachusetts.

Mr. President, because Dr. Marcus Whitman, of Walla Walla, and of the State of Washington has earned the right to stand in the company of such great names as I have mentioned, I am completely satisfied that all of them will move over and bid him welcome when in due time his statue comes across the Nation.

ADDITIONAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 726)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(For President's message, see today's proceedings of the House of Representatives on pp. 16040–16041.)

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION—BOOK BY MAX LOWENTHAL

A PATTERN OF DESTRUCTION OF RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I wish to refer briefly to a book entitled "The Federal Bureau of Investigation," written by Max Lowenthal.

DELIBERATE INTENT

At this time I do not propose to go into the contents of the book or the activities of its author, except to say that the book is obviously written by a man whose deliberate intent is to cause trouble between the President of the United States and Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

BOOK A REHASH

Most of the book is a rehash of some of Mr. Lowenthal's own work when he was employed by the Norris committee some years ago. The committee's report was favorable to the FBI. Although I shall not go into all the evidence, some parts of it are now being used on the other side, as condemning the FBI.

LONG-RANGE PATTERN

If this attack was an isolated instance it could be excused as an irresponsible flight of fancy by a comparative nonentity—but it follows too closely the pattern of destruction of responsible Government to be ignored.

DESTROY COMMUNIST RECORDS

The distinguished senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] ably informed us on this subject last Monday. The House Un-American Activities Committee has suggested the author's motive in writing the book. As a matter of fact, all one need do is to read the book to learn that the author would like to destroy the FBI and its records of Communists, fellow travelers, and deluded dupes.

I have learned that Members of both Houses of Congress, Federal judges, educators, and newspapermen received copies of the volume. The method of distribution and the extent of distribution suggests that it was a propaganda book.

PROPAGANDA BOOK

The fact that the author has a motive does not account for the fact that the book was published and placed on desks of persons who could be expected to mold some opinion or pass some judgment on the FBI and its activities. Ordinarily, books are published as a commercial venture—in anticipation of profit. Sometimes books are published at a loss in order that profit might come other ways, or that an objective, usually sinister, may be achieved.

When a book priced at $4.50 is given away in wholesale quantity, we can assume that the motive of publication is not entirely one of profit. This suspicion may grow when it can be recalled that the same publisher last year released such a book as The Sure Thing, by Merle Miller, a vicious attack on the loyalty program as it affects State Department employees.

The publisher, by the way, is William Sloane and Associates, Inc., of New York City. The book was accompanied by a letter signed by Mr. Norman Hood, vice president, which said:

> This unbiased and profoundly conservative approach will, I think, lead you to some startling conclusions.

STARTLING CONCLUSIONS—RECORD OF UNDERSTATEMENT

I must say that I did come to a startling conclusion, namely, that the author views the work of the FBI as impartially and unbiased as that great fountain of lies, slander, and abuse, the Moscow press and radio. Mr. Lowenthal is as objective against the FBI as is the Communist Party in America. His is one of a series of attacks on the FBI that have sprouted mysteriously since the conviction of Communist leaders and Red spies, and the exposures of red-handed dabblers in treason and their apprentices, the fellow dabblers.

Mr. President, there has been called to my attention a number of facts about the publishers and the executive editor for the publishers at the time the book was accepted for publication. The facts which have come to my attention are sufficient to cause me to believe that the publishers are very definitely on the side of Communist sympathizers. At this time I am not going into these details.

I merely want to say a word in defense of the FBI. It seems strange that this great organization should need any defense.

FBI THE LAST STAND BETWEEN THE ADMINISTRATION AND SUBVERSIVE GROUPS

The FBI is the last stand between the administration and utter surrender to subversive elements. During months of exposure of the connection between certain Goverment officials and those who would bring destruction on this country, it has been a source of satisfaction to many of us to know that we have the FBI, an organization entirely above suspicion of any kind. It is only natural that the subversives who have been investigated by the FBI and their defenders would like to destroy FBI records for personal reasons. The FBI has been one organization in our Government which these traitors have not been able to touch.

LOWENTHAL'S REWARD FOR THE BOOK

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a copy of a purported telegram to Robert Murphy, United States political adviser for Germany, from Secretary of State Acheson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

War Department advises that Max Lowenthal leaving soon for Berlin to assume position legal division, OMGUS, as adviser on problems of restitution, sequestration, and disposition of Jewish heirless property fund. I have had close associations with Lowenthal for many years and am confident that he has the high competence, standing, and experience in public affairs necessary to aid materially in solution of these problems. He has discussed his assignment and related questions fully with Hildring and other interested officials of the Department, and we are anxious to make certain that he will have every assistance and cooperation Department can afford him in connection with his work. Hildring and I shall personally appreciate any help that you can give him in Germany.

ACHESON, Acting.

Mr. MALONE. Apparently the reward for the unwarranted attack upon the most reputable departments of the Government is to be ample.

THE STRANGE CASE OF MICHAEL LEE, PET OF THE PATTERN

In regard to the administration's typical attitude toward these pink followers I refer to the case of one Michael Lee, who was exposed by the junior Senator from Nevada as a dangerous security risk in a key Government position—a part of the long-range pattern. While I was on a recent inspection tour with other members of the Public Works Committee the Secretary of Commerce took a rather peculiar action in this case. The loyalty board of his Department had found Mr. Lee guilty as charged and requested his expulsion. The Secretary of Commerce reversed this finding, technically clearing Mr. Lee, and then discharged him as a poor security risk.

PRESS RELEASE PROVED FALSE

Mr. President, it will be remembered that at the time this matter was brought up on the Senate floor, it was assigned to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and a subcommittee of that committee investigated the case. In the testimony it was brought out that at the time the junior Senator from Nevada made the first statement on the floor, the release cleared Mr. Lee, stating that all the charges were old charges, that they had been investigated, and that he was cleared. As a matter of fact, the junior Senator from Nevada had information at that time that he had not been cleared.

The statement released to the press by a Department of Commerce official was proved false—but the official was still there.

SECRETARY OF COMMERCE DISCHARGED LEE AND REMINGTON

Mr. President, when this matter came before the committee the testimony was given by the junior Senator from Nevada, and then certain other witnesses were heard.

Without going into detail, I may say that Mr. Sawyer stopped the examination abruptly by discharging Mr. Lee, and also Mr. Remington, whose record was very closely allied with Mr. Lee.

Mr. Remington was under indictment in New York very soon thereafter.

LEE NEVER CLEARED BY LOYALTY BOARD

Testimony was brought out to the effect that Mr. Lee had never been cleared by his own loyalty board, that they had not found enough against him to convict him of actual disloyalty, but had found enough against him to recommend that he was a dangerous security risk.

SAWYER'S ACTION INEXCUSABLE

The action subsequently taken by Mr. Sawyer, after the loyalty board of the Department of Commerce had actually found him guilty, was unexplainable and inexcusable. I do not know what was in the mind of the Secretary of Commerce, but I am inclined to believe that his action permits Mr. Lee to get another Federal job, in another department, and I am inclined to believe that it was done for the particular purpose of allowing Mr. Lee to show up on another payroll in another department, as has been done so many times in the past 15 years. It is almost impossible, out of a million and a half people, to keep track of all of them. In any case, the action was inexcusable on Mr. Sawyer's part, as well as deliberate.

SUCH ACTION TOO PREVALENT

This sort of thing has been done entirely too much. Subversives and sympathizers have gone off one payroll, disappeared briefly, and then reappeared on another Government payroll, often in a more important position. I understand that some of the homosexuals who were exposed in the State Department simply moved to another department.

MR. LEE AND THE DEFENSE OF CHINA

It will be recalled that the National Government of China blamed Mr. Lee more than any other Government official for delays in vital shipments of ethane gasoline and other war supplies to war-swept China until too late for the National Government to use them effectively against the Reds.

I recall, and testimony will be found to the effect, that General MacArthur determined that gasoline was such a necessity that he took a large supply of the barrels of gasoline from his meager supply and shipped them to China, in lieu of what they were supposed to get from the Department of Commerce, as authorized by the Congress and approved by the President, but the shipment of which was delayed inexcusably by the Department of Commerce, with Mr. Lee at the head of the Far Eastern Division.

INFORMATION OF INTEREST TO RED CHINA

There was nothing in writing by Mr. Lee, but the written replies to his evident telephone requests showed that he asked about the storage capacity in China, where it was located, the number of troops in training, where they were located, the number of planes they had, commercial planes and passenger planes, information of no interest to Mr. Lee or the Government or the department he represented, but it was of great interest to the Soviets, the "agrarian reformers," which Mr. Marshall had discovered in 1946. It was information that could be of importance only to an opposing army. So this man was "cleared" in order that he could get another job with another department.

CONGRESSMAN JUDD REPEATEDLY URGED INVESTIGATION

Representative WALTER JUDD, of Minnesota, according to a press dispatch, repeatedly urged the Department of Commerce to investigate Lee, and charged unconscionable delay in aiding China. Mr. JUDD alleged that although the China-aid bill was passed by Congress April 31, 1947, it took until July to get the paper work set up. When the British needed help after Dunkerque, President Roosevelt had ships loaded and moving in only 8 days. No real material reached China until December 8, months after Congress authorized the aid. Mr. JUDD called it suspicious and unjustifiable to have a foreigner of Russian lineage and pro-Russian leanings, heading exports to help that strategic area.

A CHINESE-BORN RUSSIAN

The man we refer to as Michael Lee is Ephraim Zinovi Liberman, of Russian parents, born in Harbin, China, and in three attempts was denied American citizenship because he was not attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States. On the fourth try, after changing his name to Michael Lee, he made it—that was in 1941—and almost immediately we find him as head of the Far Eastern Division of the Office of International Trade in our own Department of Commerce.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MALONE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. I did not quite understand the Senator's statement. Did the person in question change his name four times, and after the fourth change, he was admitted?

Mr. MALONE. He changed his name only once, but he made three applications for citizenship and was turned down because he was not attached to the principles of the Constitution. On the fourth trial, after he had married an American girl, he made it.

Mr. LANGER. He changed his name?

Mr. MALONE. Yes.

Mr. LANGER. From what to what?

Mr. MALONE. From Ephraim Zinovi Liberman to Michael Lee.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MALONE. I am giving the Senate this background to show the incongruity of the action in high places apparently designed to make it possible for a man of this character and background to get back on the Federal payroll in another department after he was found disloyal and a dangerous security risk by the Department's own loyalty board.

We need more Government offices like the FBI.

A TYPICAL CASE—A PATTERN

Mr. President, the investigation into this case was typical. I had made a direct charge and suggested calling for the FBI records. That is all a matter of testimony.

The request was made by the chairman of the committee.

FBI RECORDS NOT AVAILABLE

But, Mr. President, the FBI records were not available. The President of the United States said they were not available to the Congress of the United States. Therefore the discharge in this case was surprising even to some of us. Mr. Sawyer became a little nervous and fired both men, in order to stop the investigation. But it is more surprising that he should clear the man after his own Department board had later convicted him and then fire him as a "security risk."

THE RESOLUTION FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONE. I yield.

Mr STENNIS. The Senator from Mississippi was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Nevada began speaking. Will the Senator give us again the date of the investigation, and what committee the Senator was speaking of?

Mr. MALONE. I do not recall the date of the investigation.

Mr. STENNIS. Can the Senator give it approximately?

Mr. MALONE. I do not recall the date when the junior Senator from Nevada made the first charge on the Senate floor, but the resolution providing for the investigation, Senate Resolution 230, was submitted during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress. The resolution provides:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, in pursuance of section 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 (Public Law 601, 79th Cong.), is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the operation and administration of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not that Bureau is being operated in accordance with the law, the public interest, and the intent of the Congress.

Such study and investigation shall include, but shall not be limited to, an examination into the qualifications, honesty, competency, efficiency, and loyalty of people employed by the Department of Commerce, and particularly the qualifications, honesty, competency, efficiency, and loyalty of Michael J. Lee, formerly known as Ephraim Zinovi Liberman, Chief of the Far Eastern Division of the Office of International Trade in the Department of Commerce.

SEC. 2. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized, during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eighty-first Congress, (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable; and (3) with the consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

THE INVESTIGATING SUBCOMMITTEE

I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that on March 28, 30, and April 4, 1950, a subcommittee, headed by the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], including as its members the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], conducted the investigation. It held three hearings. During the third hearing, or very soon thereafter, Mr. Sawyer took the action, as already outlined, apparently obtaining an agreement to stop the hearings, because nothing else was done in that connection. Then the action described earlier took place.

PRESENT STATUS OF MR. LEE

Mr. STENNIS. At that point the junior Senator from Mississippi came into the Chamber. What was the subsequent action? Does the Senator say he is still employed?

Mr. MALONE. No. The subsequent action was the immediate discharge of Mr. Liberman—Mr. Lee now—and of Mr. Remington, who was associated in a general way with all these activities. But Mr. Remington submitted to the discharge, and Mr. Lee did not.

Then hearings were held before the Department of Commerce. I am not entirely familiar with the hearings that were held, but the Loyalty Board of the Department of Commerce subsequently found him guilty. The Senator understands that each department has its own loyalty board. After the loyalty board of that Department found him guilty and subsequent to the time Mr. Sawyer discharged him, Mr. Sawyer then cleared him of disloyalty so that now he is available for appointment in any another department of Government—in the Department of Commerce, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. STENNIS. But he is not now employed by the Department of Commerce.

LONG UNDER INVESTIGATION BUT NEVER SEPARATED

Mr. MALONE. No. He is separated from the Department for the first time. I will say further to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi that all during this time, after his employment by the Department of Commerce, he had been under investigation. Apparently, however, he had never even been temporarily separated from the powerful position he had as head of the Far Eastern Division.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question for information. After an individual has been found guilty by the loyalty board of a department, can the head of the department then exonerate him and make him eligible for further appointment merely by a statement issued by the head of the department?

Mr. MALONE. I have not read the official statement, but the press carried it. It said, however, that the Secretary had completely cleared him, so he could now be rehired in the Department of Commerce, as I understand it, or in any other department of the Government. The dispatch said he was cleared of all disloyalty. It further said he had been discharged by the Secretary himself, after his own department loyalty board had found Lee guilty.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. MALONE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. STENNIS. As I understand, there was a finding of guilty by the loyalty board, but still he is eligible for employment now in the Department of Commerce or in any other department.

Mr. MALONE. I am given to understand that is a fact. I understand there is nothing against his record whatever so far as the Secretary is concerned. The Secretary cleared him simply by making an arbitrary statement.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MALONE. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. I was not here when the measure relating to loyalty boards was passed. I understand each department has a separate board?

EACH DEPARTMENT DOES OWN INVESTIGATING

Mr. MALONE. Yes. The junior Senator from Nevada had never gone into that subject until he made his statement on the Senate floor. Then it became necessary for me to do so. I found that each department of government, the Department of Commerce, the Department of State, and so forth, has its own loyalty board and does its own investigating when any subject for investigation comes up, or when any accusation is made against a member of the department, just as a family would conduct its own investigation if an accusation of wrongdoing were made against a member of the family.

If the matter is pressed beyond the loyalty board of the Department, another board, the President's Loyalty Board, appointed by him and responsible only to him—not at all to the Congress of the United States—can consider the case further—conduct a further investigation or reverse the finding of the Department board. That Board can clear an accused person or find him guilty. However, it seems that Board never has held anyone to be really guilty. It operates in a peculiar fashion. It seems to operate to clear an individual rather than hearing evidence.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator. I am impressed with the case he is presenting.

Mr. MALONE. I will say further to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi that the junior Senator from Nevada introduced a bill immediately thereafter which provided for setting up a loyalty board by Congress, members thereof to be appointed by the President and approved by the Senate, so that the Congress would have some responsibility in the matter. A board set up by law could not simply clear an individual arbitrarily regardless of the evidence. It would be responsible to this body. The bill, however, is held in committee.

Mr. President, I had not intended to go so far into Mr. Liberman's case because it is closed now. At least, he is discharged and, so far as we know, has not yet been rehired in another department.

Mr. President, I wish to speak on another matter now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada may proceed.

GEN. DOUGLAS MAC ARTHUR

Mr. MALONE. The subject to which I am about to refer represents another attack on the remaining sound personnel in the administration. It is typically illustrated in the attack on Gen. Douglas MacArthur. There is no question in the mind of the junior Senator from Nevada that General MacArthur was slated for discharge very soon after election.

ATTACK ON MAC ARTHUR NOT POPULAR

But as things have turned out it seems that MacArthur is still very popular with the American people, and that it would not meet with popular approval if the President or Mr. Acheson, Secretary of State, were to attack MacArthur. So it seems that the attack now rather is coming from Europe, particularly from England.

AN INDIRECT ATTACK

The attack seems to be an indirect attack. No doubt there is a long-distance telephone connecting Washington with the nations now under the Marshall plan.

A CONTINUATION OF THE PATTERN

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a dispatch which shows that the attack is the same kind of attack as that which is being made on the FBI, although neither of the attacks is being made directly, because both MacArthur and Mr. Hoover of the FBI are much too popular for that.

PUBLIC RESPECT MR. HOOVER AND GENERAL MAC ARTHUR

Both Mr. Hoover, the head of the FBI, and General MacArthur are persons whom the American people respect and like very much, because they have a great deal of courage, which they demonstrate every day in their respective fields.

Both General MacArthur and Mr. Hoover have demonstrated again and again that they will do very well indeed if they are allowed to fight, or, in the case of Mr. Hoover, if he is allowed to make the investigations which he thinks should be made.

This dispatch is dated at Paris, November 25, a little after the election. The dispatch appeared in the international edition of the New York Times for Sunday, November 26. The headline reads as follows: "Europe is dubious on United States aim in Korea. Nations burdened by defense cost wonder if MacArthur is now going too far."

Just how they are burdened by defense costs, when we are putting up so much money for their defense and for the Marshall plan, is not clear. Nevertheless, these nations may be afraid that they might have to put up some money, and that if this situation continues it might be necessary for them to use some of their own military forces, if we continue to use our men abroad, in Korea, as bait, as has been mentioned several times.

The article reads as follows:

The second Korean crisis provoked by the Chinese intervention has coincided with new pressure on Indochina and second thoughts on Western rearmament in a way that doubly emphasizes the notable differences of view between Washington and the European capitals.

The United States decision in June to resist the Korean invasion came as an almost joyful surprise to most Europeans. To them it meant that the United States would act to resist aggression anywhere, a point on which there had been doubts.

Within the last couple of days—

This dispatch is dated November 25, but it was published in the New York Times on November 26—as Gen. Douglas MacArthur's forces have pushed toward the Yalu River, there have been dismay and fear lest the United States should act too much and go too far in the policy so heartily applauded in June.

The advance toward the Yalu River was first described here as an independent action by General MacArthur but is now interpreted as a United States diplomatic move. Neither construction of it pleases the French or British who doubted that it was the best means of getting a peaceful deal with Peiping.

The French would like to throw Indochina into the already large collection of Far Eastern problems under international discussion, thus escaping from the doctrine pronounced by Dean Acheson, United States Secretary of State, last May that the defense of Indochina was primarily the responsibility of the French and native states.

Of course, Mr. President, I was in Saigon, and elsewhere in Indochina, about the time, or a little after, we had chosen as our man the French representative in that area, to uphold his hand in the ruling of Indochina and putting down all insurrections. The Communists had a man there, too. The folks who live there did not have anyone. We are not taking their part, either; we are supporting colonialism by the empire-minded nations in that area, to keep the people of that area under the yoke of France, just as in Singapore the British are doing the same thing. In other words, we are backing colonialism in the Far East, just as we are backing colonialism in Africa.

I have described before the visit I made on that occasion, so I shall not go into detail now about it. It was made at the time when the armies were facing each other in Indochina. No one then seemed to be for the Indonesians. Some persons were for the Dutch; but the Indonesians have worked that out now.

Everywhere we go we seem to be ready to aid someone who wishes to put a yoke on the native people. The evidence indicated to me that all those native people hate our guts right down to the ground, because we are backing those who are keeping the yoke on them.

I continue to read the dispatch:

There would be no violent objection here if Formosa were sacrificed to a modus vivendi with Peiping that would end the pressure on Indochina.

In other words, there would be no objection in Europe if we sacrificed Formosa and withdrew from it.

I read further from the dispatch:

The French concern to liquidate or reduce the burden of the Indochinese war has been intensified by its growing financial cost at a time when the financing of France's share in European rearmament has become a major problem for the Government, even though the United States is helping.

Mr. President, I should say, "Even though the United States is giving them much more money than anything in Indochina is costing them." We are financing that deal.

I read further from the dispatch:

Premier Rene Plevin's newspaper has sought to reassure the public by explaining that taxes next year will rise by only about 9 percent and that this rise will eat up only 2 percent of an increasing national income. But these statistics do not prevent the new budget from being a first-class headache for the Plevin Cabinet as it faces a Parliament whose normal aversion to taxation is redoubled by the approach of a national election.

The financial burden of the present defense program for Frenchmen would be perhaps twice what it is were it not for United States aid in the form of both credits and finished material. About 20 percent of the defense expenditure written into the budget this week will be supplied by the United States. Probably 50 percent or more of the total outlay on French armament in the coming year will be furnished by the United States, counting war material as well as dollar credits.

Moreover, about one-third of the industrial investment proposed under the Monnet plan for 1951 will come from the counterpart fund created by the Marshall plan.

Mr. President, the Monnet plan, I have described at various times. I had a 3-hour conference with Mr. Monnet in France in 1947. At that time he outlined all these nice projects they were going to build in France with our money.

At the end of his talk, I inquired as to who would own the projects when they were finished. I was told that France, of course, would own them, or that the French Government would own them. I asked, "Is any method of amortization or for making interest payments being provided?" However, it seemed that there was no thought of such a thing.

So I told Mr. Monnet that such a procedure was just a little strange to me. I said that I had been connected with most of the large projects in the western part of the United States, such as Boulder Dam and Hoover Dam, and that before most of them were begun and before the beginning of their construction was permitted, we required that definite arrangements be made for the amortization of their cost and for the payment of the interest.

However, under the Monnet plan, the French Government will own all the projects we are building there. In short, we are putting the French Government in that business. It seems a little unusual, but it seems to be accepted now that that is the thing to do. That is the great Monnet plan.

I read further from the dispatch:

There are therefore no important French voices urging emancipation from United States aid, as there apparently are in Britain, where some members of the Labor Party seem to believe that Washington pushes Britain into more rearmament than she can afford.

Of course, Mr. President, we may push them into more rearmament than we can afford, if this keeps up.

I read further from the dispatch:

Yet the difference between the Washington approach and the French approach was illustrated by Foreign Minister Robert Schuman's speech in Strasbourg yesterday when he defended the French plan for a European army as an effort to carry a political objective into the military sphere.

In other words, Mr. President, we are the push behind the western European defenses, and no European nation seems to be very much interested.

I read further from the dispatch:

The German approach appears similar in the sense that the western Germans want to barter their military contribution to acquire greater sovereignty.

Consequently there is lacking in Europe both the sense of urgency and the singleness of purpose that distinguished the United States efforts to build up western defenses. Here rearmament has many aspects that are sometimes overlooked or underestimated in Washington.

For example, behind the prospective visit to Washington of a delegation of the European Marshall plan council early in December—

I may say that as a part of this foreign influence we now hear about the proposed visit of Attlee, who will arrive in just a little while. Apparently they are not able to make exactly clear what they want over long distance; even though they have been running our foreign policy for a long time, it is going to be necessary for them to come over here now to explain it in more detail, in order to continue the direction we are going.

Is the desire of Europeans to be assured that if they economize on vital raw materials, the result will not be merely that the excess thus saved will go into United States stockpiles at rising prices. This is an aspect of rearmament that worries Europeans as they face new payments deficits, but that has hardly yet been discussed by higher officials.

Economic Cooperation Administration officials were delighted when the European Payments Union managed to deal with the Western German payments deficit, even though the Washington officials had refused a request for additional aid. They believed this was a good example of the Europeans facing their problems without United States help.

But the goal of European financial independence has receded into a perhaps distant future as a result of the new defense programs. Marshall plan aid may be ended in 1952, as originally provided, but other United States aid, for both normal and defense production, will replace it.

Mr. President, that would be the Gray plan, the great plan that picks up with millions of dollars after the Marshall plan ends, and invests in everything in sight, and looks around for more things in which to invest. The Gray plan attempts to show us that the United States must continue to divide its wealth voluntarily, until the Torquay conference can level the tariffs and import fees and divide our markets with the other nations of the world. That is a great plan.

Consequently the delicate diplomacy between the giver of aid and the recipients—

It is a very delicate thing. It is a very delicate situation—between the giver of aid and the recipients which has characterized the Marshall plan, with the United States insisting upon collective achievements that Europeans often were reluctant to undertake, may now be extended into the future and into the economic and military fields.

EUROPE'S ATTACK ON MAC ARTHUR

That is a very interesting thing. But the most interesting thing of all, Mr. President, is that the attack upon MacArthur is now coming from Europe, namely, from England, from France, and from other nations. As the junior Senator from Nevada sees it, the general is simply too popular a man for anyone in this administration to attack.

HANDICAPPING GENERAL MAC ARTHUR

I do not know how the United Nations thinks a man fights a war, or fights any fight. When he reached the thirty-eighth parallel they put their arms around him and held his arms down to his body for 10 days while the enemy recruited and dug in and got more munitions with which to fight him and to kill a few more American boys over there. We are now up against Manchuria. No one seems to know how far we are going. But we stop him from attacking behind the lines, where the munitions and troops are mobilized, and make him wait until they "hit the line," just as in a football game. "Don't start until the whistle blows."

Mr. President, if we do not look out, one of these days ways will be found to defeat even General MacArthur. No one can win a fight under such conditions.

Mr. President, coming back to the attack on Mr. Hoover, Mr. Max Lowenthal's book is a roundabout attack through an already discredited official or exofficial, or a man who had worked for one of the committees.

SOKOLSKY'S OUTLINE OF LOWENTHAL

I have before me a very interesting article written by George Sokolsky, a man whom I greatly admire for his forthrightness of manner. The article appeared in the November 30 issue of the Washington Times-Herald. That was yesterday. In this article Mr. Sokolsky says:

Most of my colleagues have written about Max Lowenthal's book on J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI. Apparently they have read the book, but I must plead that I had other business on hand.

Anybody can be negative about such a job as J. Edgar Hoover does. Did Hoover catch the fellows who stole the ballot boxes in the Kansas City, Mo., election? No. He did not.

Was Harry Truman in Kansas City when the safe containing the ballot boxes was blown up? Yes, he was there. So.

That kind of argument can lead to nothing. A police department is to be judged by its general record, by the honesty and efficiency of its employees, and by its own adherence to the law.

The most provable criticism of the FBI is that while it collected evidence to convict spies, traitors, Communists and their fellow travelers, its accomplishments in this field have, on the whole, been unsatisfactory because on orders from the State Department and the Department of Justice, spies were not to be arrested.

In the evidence of Larry Kerley before the McCarran committee, the evidence shows that the FBI had Arthur Alexandrovich Adams, one of the worst spies Soviet Russia ever sent to this country, but the State Department safeguarded him from arrest.

Mr. President, those are strong words, and this man wrote them down. He is not immune.

Continuing:

In 1917, Lowenthal went on a secret foreign mission. This is what he says on the subject [in appearance before the House Committee on Un-American Activities—Editor]:

"It was a confidential mission that I don't care to go into. It was only for a short time, and I never discuss that kind of Government work with anybody."

You would imagine that in 1917 this secret mission was so terrific that it could only have been to Lenin or Trotzky or somebody like that, although I was in Petrograd in those days and do not recall Lowenthal, whose mission must have been too important even for history.

Max Lowenthal has held innumerable jobs with various branches of the Government from 1912 almost up to date. Some of them were of this character, to use his own words:

"In 1942 or 1943 there was some kind of problem, it is not quite clear in my mind; there was a war commission, I don't remember its name; it was headed by Mr. McNutt."

He is quoting from Mr. Lowenthal.

Mr. WHEELER—

That is Mr. Burt Wheeler, one of the keenest Senators who ever served on this floor, according to my book.

Mr. WHEELER. Paul McNutt?

This was from the cross examination. I continue:

Mr. WHEELER. Paul McNutt?

Mr. LOWENTHAL. Yes, Paul McNutt. I was sworn to assist them for a very temporary period on something or other, trying to straighten out some difficulties among some men who were not part of the Government.

He is still quoting from Mr. Lowenthal.

Mr. Chairman, I wouldn't remember these things too definitely, and anything any records would show that would correct me. I would accept those corrections.

Toward the end of 1943 or early 1944 I left that work. During all that period and since that period I have been consulted informally by various people in the Government, but so far as I can recollect at this moment, I don't think ever in any official capacity. There might be some, and I would be very glad to have those noted for the record.

Mr. President, I am quoting from an article written on the basis of a record, and reference is made to the man who wrote a book on the FBI. I continue:

It is a little difficult to believe that Mr. Lowenthal cannot remember what he did for Paul McNutt. It was not so long ago nor could it have been very important. Mr. Lowenthal's lapse of memory at this point is, to say the least, fascinating.

Mr. Lowenthal was asked who had recommended him for employment by the War Department. This is his reply:

"I couldn't say for certain. I was asked by a group of organizations whether I would permit my name to be submitted for recommendation by General Clay, and I agreed."

What are those organizations? He must know, but he does not say. No names of organizations. No names of individuals. It all hangs in the vacuum of secrecy and mystery.

At this point, Mr. President, let me say that I have the highest regard for Paul McNutt. I do not remember about this testimony, but it is mentioned here merely to show the type of this man and his memory. He had memory enough to write a 450-page book, but he did not have memory enough to know what important missions he was sent on by the War Department. I read further:

What are those organizations? He must know, but he does not say. No names of organizations. No names of individuals. It all hangs in the vacuum of secrecy and mystery.

Some of the pages of this hearing would interest a psychologist, who might write a doctor of philosophy thesis about them. Here is a man who started his career as secretary to Judge William Mack, a jurist of distinction who would not take on a dope.

I continue reading from the article by Mr. Sokolsky:

He goes through years of Government service and is associated with Senator Burton K. Wheeler on the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate.

Wheeler is an extraordinarily shrewd man. He would not hire a forgetful Jane. Yet, time after time, Mr. Lowenthal cannot remember dates, names, facts which no ordinary man could forget.

It is difficult to help wondering how a man, who forgets so much so easily, could remember so much about the FBI.

ATTACKS NOT ISOLATED

Mr. President, this attack on Government is not confined to isolated instances. If it were, it would be excusable. But here are two men. The first is Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, of the FBI. The second is General MacArthur, who, the American people are convinced, is one of the greatest generals that the United States has ever produced. These two men are made the subject of isolated attacks. The attacks all tie in together in a deliberate pattern.

DESTROYING THE ECONOMIC SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. President, we have debated this issue a good many times on the floor of the Senate. Since 1934 the administration has deliberately entered into a line of action calculated to destroy the economic system of the United States, through deficit financing and the free trade program to divide the American markets with the nations of the world, removing all semblance of a floor under wages and investments. From the end of World War II we started giving away the strategic areas of the earth, needed to defend the United States of America. What happened at Yalta—Manchuria, Korea, Berlin? At Yalta we gave away Manchuria over the almost dead body of Chiang Kai-shek, without his knowledge, and then forced him to take it. We divided Korea into North Korea and South Korea, which undoubtedly hastened the advent of the present conflict. We gave way in Berlin, without retaining any means of ingress or egress. This made necessary heroic efforts to maintain a coal lift, which involved an expense of several hundred dollars a ton to haul coal into Berlin. There was nothing on the railroads, nothing on the highways, and nothing on the river except a few sentries who said, "You cannot pass."

REQUIRES A GREAT NATION TO TAKE THIS BEATING

Mr. President, it would take a great nation to stand up very much longer under an attack of this kind. It seems to me that it is time to stop such dangerous practices or at least expose them for what they are, namely, attacks on the great men who are still carrying their weight in the United States Army and in the greatest investigative body in the world.

ATTACKS DELIBERATE AND CALCULATED

In conclusion, let me tie these things together. They are not isolated things and cases. They come from separate sources. The attacks are deliberate and calculated.

The attack on General MacArthur comes from Europe, from the countries which are enjoying our bounty. They are on our payroll, just as are the FBI and the Secretary of State. The attacks on one of the greatest generals in the world are still being made. We hold him at the 38th parallel. We handicap him. We hold him on the Manchurian border and do not let him attack. We let the Reds murder our American boys.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. LUCAS to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I rise to discuss the pending question. I desire the RECORD to clearly show my position with respect to the pending motion to consider the Alaska statehood bill. Of course we all recognize that the fate of the motion will carry with it the fate of the Hawaiian statehood bill. Frankly, I fully realize that so far as the event is concerned, I am unduly taking the time of the Senate. I realize that so far as the pending motion is concerned, all it now needs is its obsequies. The end was a foregone conclusion when the motion was made. It has been perfectly clear for months that no vote would be had by the Eighty-first Congress on the merits of either of the statehood bills.

Before I discuss the bills and the present parliamentary situation, I wish to digress for a moment to express my own deep appreciation to the present occupant of the Chair [Mr. O'MAHONEY] for the yeoman service he has rendered as chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in holding hearings on both bills, in reaching a conclusion by the committee on both bills, in reporting both bills to the Senate, and in endeavoring to get the Senate to give consideration to them. Being a member of the committee, I know the difficulties with which he as chairman was faced. Being a Member of the Senate, I know the difficulties with which he and I and all of us who believe that a measure of this kind is entitled to be heard on its merit have been faced since the bills were reported.

As I stand on my feet this afternoon, I am under no illusion as to what the end will be—the end has been.

However, Mr. President, other days will come. Somewhere, somehow, sometime the hopes and aspirations of the United States citizens who reside in the present Territory of Alaska, and the hopes, aspirations, and dreams of the citizens of the United States who reside in the Territory of Hawaii, must have recognition before this body.

Mr. President, the people of the United States have spoken on the question. Time after time the people of America have spoken in polls throughout the United States. The press of America has spoken. It is overwhelmingly in favor of the statehood measures. I realize that polls do not enjoy the same measure of sanctity they had before the Presidential elections of 1948. However, they are not wholly discredited.

I think at this time it would be well to invite the attention of the Senate to the result of such a poll which was taken by Dr. Gallup during the current year. It was taken after the 25th day of June, the date of the invasion of Korea. Thereafter, in the latter part of July, the result of the Gallup poll on statehood appeared in the papers of the country. The result was very carefully presented by Dr. Gallup. It was more than a showing of the result of the most recent poll. A comparative showing was made also.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of the Gallup poll as it appeared in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin on July 29, 1950, be incorporated in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the poll was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GALLUP POLL ON STATEHOOD—TIDE OF PUBLIC SENTIMENT RUNS HIGH AS RESULT OF WAR IN KOREA

(By George Gallup, director of the American Institute of Public Opinion)

One aftermath of the Korean War has been a sharp increase in public sentiment in favor of admitting Hawaii and Alaska into the Union as the forty-ninth and fiftieth States.

Shortly after President Truman announced the decision to defend Korea, the American Institute of Public Opinion put its Nation-wide corps of interviewers to work.

They sampled a carefully constructed cross section of the voting population in all areas of the continental United States on the question of statehood for the Hawaiian and Alaskan Territories—both strategic areas in any Pacific war.

It found a vote of 7 to 1 in favor of Hawaiian statehood, highest favorable sentiment in 9 years, and 10 to 1 in favor of Alaskan statehood.

Here is the trend of the vote on Hawaiian statehood:

"Would you favor or oppose having Hawaii admitted as a State in the Union?"

	Yes	No	No opinion
	Percent	Percent	Percent
1941	48	23	29
1946	60	19	21
1949	58	12	30
February 1950	64	16	20
Today	76	10	14

The vote on Alaskan statehood follows:

"Would you favor or oppose having Alaska admitted as a State in the Union?"

	Yes	No	No opinion
	Percent	Percent	Percent
1949	68	7	25
Today	81	8	11

STIRS RENEWED INTEREST

The Korean crisis, with the possibility that it may lead to war between the United States and Russia, stirred renewed interest in Congress in admitting Hawaii and Alaska into the Union. Both places were important military bases in the last war.

Hawaii itself has just drawn up a constitution looking toward statehood.

Admission of Hawaii would climax a long fight conducted in Washington on behalf of statehood by JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON, Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

Senator JOSEPH O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, has served as spearhead in the Senate for pro-statehood forces.

NO PARTISAN DIFFERENCES

As in previous surveys, today's study finds little difference of opinion by political parties on the statehood issue. Democratic and Republican voters join hands in voting for admission.

Here is the vote by party affiliation on the question of Hawaiian statehood:

	Yes	No	No opinion
	Percent	Precent	Percent
Democrats	77	9	14
Republicans	76	12	12
Independents	72	14	14

Mr. CORDON. I invite attention only to some extracts from the poll. Dr. Gallup says that when this poll was taken, after the crossing of the thirty-eighth parallel by the Korean Communists, the vote was 7 to 1 in favor of Hawaiian statehood, the highest favorable sentiment in 9 years, and 10 to 1 in favor of Alaskan statehood.

That was the result of a careful poll of public opinion taken by one of the outstanding men in his field. It was taken after the beginning of the Korean aggression. Dr. Gallup says:

Here is the trend of the vote on Hawaiian statehood.

The question:

Would you favor or oppose having Hawaii admitted as a State in the Union?

In 1941, 48 percent voted yes; 23 percent voted no; 29 percent had no opinion.

In 1946, 60 percent voted yes; 19 percent voted no; 21 percent had no opinion.

In 1949, 58 percent voted yes; 12 percent voted no; 30 percent had no opinion.

In February of this year, 64 percent voted yes; 16 percent voted no; 20 percent had no opinion.

Today—this was after the Korean aggression had taken place—76 percent of those polled voted yes; 10 percent voted no; 14 percent had no opinion.

That was the result at the poll on Hawaiian statehood.

As to Alaskan statehood, the subject now under consideration—or at least it is pending at the moment and not yet buried—the question asked in the Gallup poll was: Would you favor or oppose having Alaska admitted as a State in the Union?

In 1949, 68 percent voted yes; 7 percent voted no; 25 percent had not made up their minds.

Today, after the beginning of the Korean aggression, 81 percent voted yes; 8 percent voted no; 11 percent had no opinion.

Mr. President, the results of the polls represent the thinking of the people of the United States. We who are honored with the confidence of these people, and who are sent here to represent them on the floor of the Senate, should give some thought to such an overwhelming expression of opinion on the part of the people we represent.

Mr. President, I have listened to the debates on the floor of the Senate. Those that I could not remain on the floor to hear I have read with care. I have particularly paid attention to the debate against the motion now pending. I desire to consider somewhat the contents of the statements made, the major aspects of them, so far as the points of opposition are concerned. But before I do that I should like to suggest my position on the statehood bill. I am discussing its merits. The debate has not been on a parliamentary motion to take up a bill. The debate has reflected the views of those who spoke as to whether they were for or against statehood for Alaska, so we might as well forget the fiction and go to the facts.

My position with reference to statehood for Alaska and statehood for Hawaii can be summed up thus: If taxation without representation was tyranny in 1776, it is tyranny today. If the right of people to govern themselves, to participate in their government, was so dear to those giants of old who gathered and promulgated and signed the Declaration of Independence, that they were willing to pledge their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, in support of that proposition, it is just as dear today.

Mr. President, what we are considering is not a minor political question. We are dealing with people. We are dealing with our own citizens. The white people of Alaska were made citizens by the treaty of annexation. The same is true of the population of Hawaii. The Territorial status of each guarantees to every individual in either Territory whose citizenship has been created under either of the organic acts or the treaties of annexation every constitutional right and immunity that is given to any citizen of the United States anywhere. They have every constitutional guaranty that I have or that the Presiding Officer has. They have every right I have or that he has except the right which brought our forebearers into meeting when they promulgated the Declaration of Independence. They do not have the right to sit in the high councils of their government and have their representative there speak and work for them and for the Nation.

Mr. President, to me it is inconceivable that there could be any question in the mind of anyone as to the right of every American citizen to enjoy the full privileges of citizenship if in the area where he resides there are no more obstacles than are found in either of these two Territories. I can conceive of circumstances where citizenship might not, because of very real conditions, ripen into full-fledged voting and representation rights. I can understand that. But there is nothing here of that character.

The right of people to govern themselves and choose their representatives and have their voices heard through those representatives is the highest privilege and right that can come to them; and in this instance we are dealing with people, not with geographical areas; we are dealing with American citizens.

Mr. President, I wish that we could have had this bill before the Senate with some fair chance to go into it fully, to explore it to the utmost. I should like to take the time to traverse the statements made in the debate paragraph by paragraph and point by point, and indicate wherein it would seem to me that the speakers have not given the time which they should have given to the seriousness of this problem.

I have no criticism of any of my colleagues who take a view opposite to mine. I have been wrong many times. I think I am right now. But I do not criticize any for holding opposite views. I feel that there is a duty which devolves upon every Member of the Senate, however, to do whatever is humanly possible to help all who may be interested to gain a full understanding of the problems which confront us. I should like to see that done.

I shall not now take the time to do it, Mr. President, because I know it would be time wasted. I know that matters of desperate necessity will be before the Senate very shortly. I know that however much we may believe in the rights of our fellow citizens to 100-percent participation in our Government, nevertheless we would have to join others in setting aside consideration of the statehood bill in order to consider other measures of tremendous importance made necessary from the world situation.

Mr. President, I also know that this is a rump session of the Senate. I know that there are Members of this body who feel just as deeply in opposition to these bills as I could feel in favor of them, or as even the citizens of Alaska and Hawaii feel. I know that those who have that deep opposition will—and they have frankly so stated—take advantage of every parliamentary situation in their favor to delay action or to defeat the motion.

Again, I do not criticize. I regret today more than ever since I have been in the Senate that we have not been able to do more to require that action be taken in this body when matters are presented to it of the gravity of the subject now under consideration. I am for the first time deeply doubtful as to whether we can go forward in an orderly fashion in the United States Senate with unlimited debate.

Mr. President, I have had great sympathy for my colleagues from the southern States. I know something of their problems. I was born in a southern State, of a southern mother. Frankly, I feel that my friends in the South have perhaps, as we say in the West, been too close to the trees for a long time fully to be able to evaluate the forest. I think perhaps prejudice has obscured their vision at times. I think perhaps their own people have gone further than they fully realize they have in a matter which very deeply concerns them. I can go a long way in support of deep-seated and honest convictions of my colleagues where the matters directly at hand are only concerned. But that is not the case here. Here we seek only to grant all the rights of citizenship to residents in two geographical areas which heretofore the Government of the United States has incorporated into this Union. We seek here only to carry out the basic tenets of the Government of the United States.

Indirectly, of course, that would mean two Senators from Alaska added to the United States Senate, and two Senators from Hawaii added to the United States Senate. But, Mr. President, there is none so wise as to be able at this time to know what views those new Members of this body would entertain on the so-called civil-rights question or any other question, nor how long they would entertain the views which they brought with them, nor what views their successors would have in the years to come. We do know that those Members of this body would be the choice of American citizens who would have the right to make the choice, and with respect to whom, Mr. President, in my view, we do not have the right to deny the right to make the choice.

Mr. President, as to the objections which have been made on the floor as to noncontiguity, it is a fact that Alaska and Hawaii are not contiguous Territories. If a Senator, after sound consideration, reaches the view that that is an insurmountable obstacle to statehood of the Territories, he has that right. But, at best, the arguments as to sparseness of population, lack of political maturity, lack, as of the minute, of adequate financial resources for a new State, are weak. None of them, save that of noncontiguity, can apply to Hawaii. Hawaii is self-sufficient economically. Hawaii has had a long history of self-government patterned after the State governments of these United States. Alaska has a similar history, though it is not so long as that of Hawaii.

More reason could be advanced, let me in all frankness say, for opposition on the ground of lack of economic sufficiency in Alaska, than can be advanced with respect to Hawaii. But, Mr. President, as was said in the opening statement on this matter by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] who now presides over the Senate, Alaska is a treasure house of unknown potentialities, but, as now cataloged, her potentialities are adequate to guarantee all the assets needed for complete self-government. Those assets are not all immediately available and producing, but let me say that until statehood comes to Alaska, and its people have the right of citizens to set up and operate their own government and have their voices heard in the two Houses of Congress—until that takes place this vast storehouse will never be opened, and I think no one knows that better than the members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Give to Alaska statehood, and Alaska will take care of the rest. I say that, Mr. President, as one who alone voted in the committee against a favorable report on the Alaska statehood bill. I believed then, as I believe now, that the provisions made in the bill are not adequate for complete self-sufficiency financially for a new State of Alaska. But I know that the potentialities are there, and I know that Congress, after a resurvey, can take care of that particular question. I also know that it never can take care of it until statehood comes to Alaska. That has been the history of our country.

Let us remember that this country today is operating under a completely different philosophy with reference to federally owned natural resources than existed when the other States came into the Union. When the State of Wyoming came into the Union, and before that, when the State of Oregon came into the Union, and before that, when the State of California came into the Union, and before that, when the State of Minnesota and the other States came into the Union—in those days every acre of the public domain was deemed to be held in trust by the Federal Covernment to be transmitted to the settlers in the new areas, and it was all open to them. It is no longer open. A new philosophy of ownership and management in the Federal Government has come about, and it has resulted in management by remote control and government by remote control, and it cannot help but result in that.

In that statement there is nothing critical of the departments who are doing the work connected with the Territories. I have criticized them when I thought they were wrong. I shall do so again when I think they are wrong. But there is inherent in the concept of management on the basis of ownership the necessity of absentee landlordism when the seat of the Government is in Washington, D. C., and the lands are 1,000 2,000, 3,000, 5,000 miles away. That is bound to result, and so long as it does result we will not have the kind of development that came to Wyoming, the kind of development that came to Oregon, the kind of development that came to California, the kind of development that came to all the other States. There must be created in Alaska the local government which can require, by virtue of its very necessities, the changing of the basic laws with reference to its assets and that, Mr. President, will be nothing new. That has happened time and time again in the history of the United States.

In my own State of Oregon we had special Federal laws to aid the settlers who came West into that unpeopled Territory. We had a special donation law by which a man and his wife might acquire 640 acres in the form of a donation from the Federal Government, 320 acres to each, and they might take it anywhere within the boundaries of the Territory without respect to legal subdivisions. That was a donation act passed especially for the people in the Oregon Territory. There was one for Arkansas, as I recall, the Swamp Land Act, a special concession to that area because of the peculiar conditions which existed in that area, where every acre of swampland became the property of the State, to enable the State to reclaim it and prepare it for the State's citizens and settlers. That was a special act to take care of a specific condition in order to encourage the development of that area. That Swamp Land Act was expended by successive acts time after time, and today embraces the State of Oregon, among others, and, I believe, the State of Wyoming.

Mr. President, that is nothing in the way of an obstacle to statehood for Alaska. Those matters can be handled certainly by Congress when it has behind it the experience of all the years which have gone by and which have witnessed the development of 2,000,000,000 acres of land within continental United States. All the people of Alaska need is an opportunity to prove that they can take care of themselves on a State basis. Let them have their State. Let them send their Representatives to the Senate and to the House of Representatives. Let us have before us the practical necessities of those people, and out of that vast treasure house we can meet those necessities in a practical manner after we can identify what is most needed.

Opposition has been heard here, Mr. President, because several thousand people are employed there, it is said, by the Federal Government. My answer is, "So what?"

In the first place, they are not employed by the Federal Government; they are employed by contractors who have contracts with the Federal Government. However, Mr. President, if we are to say that receiving Federal assistance is a bar to the exercise of all the rights and privileges of citizenship, what shall we say with respect to farm-support prices?

What shall we say with respect to national highways? What shall we say with respect to soil-conservation payments, and so forth—aids rendered by the Federal Government to the people all over these United States? Has that so corrupted them that they are not now entitled or able to discharge the duties of citizenship? The argument, Mr. President, falls of its own weight. It needs no answer.

Sparseness of population is advanced as an argument against statehood for Alaska. Mr. President, when the State of Oregon came into the Union, it had but 52,000 people, not 112,000, as is now the case in Alaska. The opponents of statehood for Alaska speak of the vast areas of Alaska that are unpeopled. Mr. President, I can take you down highways in my own State of Oregon and let you drive 115 miles without seeing a house, much less a service station, and I suspect that the same thing can be done in Wyoming and elsewhere on the Great Plateau. Certainly that argument has no validity.

Mr. President, there are arguments against the granting of statehood to Alaska, but they are not found in that sort of reasoning. I know they cannot be met in action on this floor at this time.

I could have hoped that after the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs had rendered its report last June, we might have had a full and fair chance on the floor of the United States Senate to get these bills before the Senate and to determine whether majority rule should prevail. It would have been a trial by ordeal; that I recognize.

But, Mr. President, we are going to have to face that issue; and the sooner we do so the better for the United States. We have had other trials by ordeal. We are going to have to face it. Had the statehood measures been brought up—and, Mr. President, I feel that the majority party has to carry the load for that failure; I think those bills could have been brought up at the last session, with adequate time to determine, by trial by ordeal, if necessary, whether we can legislate on the basis of majority rule—the situation now would be different. However, we did not have that chance.

I feel very frankly that the making of the motion at this rump session represented little more than a gesture. I know that the President of the United States time after time has requested the Congress to act on this matter. I know that both parties, when asking for the people's votes, have pledged their support for statehood, and I know that the Democratic Party pledged its support for immediate statehood. Both parties have failed, Mr. President. Let us face it frankly.

There will be deep and bitter disappointment in the northland and in the islands of Hawaii. I can only say to those people, "Do not despair. Bring your cause again to the Congress, to both Houses of the Congress." I think I can say, "The committees of both Houses will help you get your bills again on the calendar."

Let us start a new session with new hope, and let us never cease trying. There must be a day when the representatives of the people of this country will respond to the will of those whom they represent; and, Mr. President, on that day we will find two more stars in the flag of this Union.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of asking the very able senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] if I may be associated with him in his excellent plea and his presentation of the compelling reasons why this measure should be given the right of legislative consideration, and also his reasoning as to why this measure and the one granting statehood to Hawaii should be enacted at this time. His presentation constitutes one of the most intelligent reasonings I have heard in the Senate Chamber why this measure constitutes sound proposed legislation and why we should act upon it now.

I wish to say, further, that the argument regarding the distance of Hawaii from the mainland of the United States and the distance of Alaska from the main body of the United States is not such that we should take it into consideration. The attempt in the course of the arguments to raise a fear that the distance is too great for adequate and proper protection, so far as the United States is concerned, in the case of these particular Territories is not sound. Time has changed the mode of transportation; and today it is not so hazardous or so time consuming to travel from the United States mainland to Hawaii as it was when our forefathers traveled from this Capital City to the then distant land of Oregon or even to the then distant land of Minnesota.

So, Mr. President, I say this is the time when the Congress should enact the proposed legislation which is before us, and should provide statehood not only for Alaska but also for Hawaii.

Again I wish to state to the very able senior Senator from Oregon that his reasoning in support of statehood for both of these Territories is most sound, and I ask that I may associate myself with him in his plea for statehood for them.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to take a very few minutes to associate myself with the exceedingly able argument which my senior colleague has made in support of statehood for Alaska and for Hawaii.

I have been a very long time coming to a final decision on this issue. During the last year I have read and studied extensively on this subject. It was not until shortly before the end of the recent session of Congress that I made my first public statement of position on this issue, when I announced that I had concluded that, on the facts and on the merits, statehood should be granted to both Hawaii and Alaska.

From October 15 to October 20, I traveled throughout Alaska with a subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate, headed by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT]. The other member of the subcommittee was the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL]. We covered the following major points in Alaska, which I mention now because I wish to use the observations I made during that inspection trip as a basis for certain conclusions which I wish to draw in support of statehood for Alaska: We arrived in Alaska, at Anchorage; we traveled from Anchorage to Nome; from Nome to Fairbanks, and on to Eilson Field, to Whittier, to Seward, to Juneau, to Annette, to Ketchikan, and back to the States.

At all those points we conducted a series of public hearings, Mr. President, on the basic question of Alaskan defenses; but in the course of that investigation in Alaska we had ample opportunity to study the Alaskan statehood problem and to weigh the points of view which were presented to us by the people in that Territory.

I wish to make very clear, Mr. President, that we did not conduct any hearings on the question of Alaska statehood. Such observations respecting statehood for Alaska as any member of that subcommittee made, he made on his personal and independent behalf.

This afternoon I propose to speak only for the junior Senator from Oregon, as a member of that subcommittee. I wish to say that the greatest human drama I have ever observed, I observed in Nome, Alaska, when on October 18, I believe it was, we conducted a public hearing in the courthouse, where we listened to witnesses testify in behalf of some 150 fellow American citizens, residents of the Seward Peninsula. We observed them exercise one of the greatest of all the freedoms incident to being an American, namely, the freedom to petition their Government for the redress of what they consider to be a wrong.

In testimony ably prepared, they presented to our committee the evidence on which they based their petition for more adequate defense, not for themselves alone, not for Nome alone, but for the entire Seward Peninsula. Two of those witnesses will always remain very vivid in my memory, Mr. President; one of them, a Mr. A. Polet, who has spent 51 years in Nome. He has raised his family there, presently lives with his grandchildren in Nome. He has been a past president of various civic clubs and is presently secretary of the Nome Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Polet is one of the leading merchants of the Seward Peninsula, beloved by all the residents of that area, including the native Eskimos. The other witness I wish to especially mention is a Mr. Jones, who has been in Nome for 53 years, and who for many years was a member of the Senate of the Territory of Alaska. These witnesses presented to us, as our committee report I am sure will eventually show, convincing evidence that the resources of the Seward Peninsula are of such vital importance to the security of America that they must never be allowed to fall into the hands of Soviet Russia. As we sat in the courthouse listening to the testimony presented in the course of the hearing, we were less than 10 minutes by jet plane from one of the greatest concentrations of air power ever assembled by any nation—the air power of Soviet Russia assembled on Siberian soil. I repeat that this powerful concentration of Russian air might is a little less than 10 minutes by jet plane from Nome, Alaska. Of course, we were a shorter time than that from Big Diomede, which is well known to be one of the great military installations of Soviet Russia. Figuratively, it is just a stone's throw from Nome. It is also well known, Mr. President, if one is in Alaska—and the Delegate from Alaska in the House of Representatives is in the Senate Chamber at this moment, who could verify what I say—that our planes do not get near Big Diomede, although it is such a short distance from American shores. They do not approach Big Diomede because of the military installations of Russia on Big Diomede.

As we looked out of the window of that courthouse onto Marks Field, which was one of the great air bases of America during World War II, what did we see? We saw a field which to all intents and purposes has been dismantled—stark, ghostly evidence of one of the great mistakes of America since World War II, as far as its demobilization and disarmament program is concerned. I would point out this afternoon that for a long time following the close of World War II we were actually engaging, senselessly in my opinion, in a disarmament program in America as well as a demobilization program. Marks Field stands as a stark reality of that fact.

These witnesses, Mr. President, testified for defense of the Seward Peninsula, not for themselves alone, as I say, not for Nome alone, but for the Seward Peninsula, because the resources of the Seward Peninsula are vital to the security of every American living in continental United States. And so, as my able colleague has pointed out in his excellent speech here today, we are dealing with a Territory which is a rich storehouse of natural resources vital to our security. As he further pointed out, the people who live in the Territory where these resources are located most certainly are entitled to adequate defense, and they are entitled to a voice in American governmental policies, backed up by voting representation.

In fact, for a long time one of the cardinal principles that we have enunciated in our relations with foreign peoples has been the principle of supporting self-determination. But I want to say we are guilty of not giving to our fellow Americans the right to exercise self-determination in Alaska, because that right cannot be exercised unless the right of self-government goes along with it. Therefore, the first major point I wish to make in support of my conclusion that Alaska—and it is equally applicable to Hawaii—should be given statehood, is that I believe that from the standpoint of living up to the principle of self-determination American citizens living in Alaska are entitled to self-government.

Mr. President, I would point out that we have tried to make clear throughout our history that we do not look with favor upon a policy of colonialism, because a policy of colonialism inevitably, as history shows, is inclined to lead to taking advantage of the subjects of the colony. It is inclined to lead to a pattern of exploitation of people who are not given a voting voice in self-government.

One cannot travel through Alaska, one cannot talk to the many people with whom we talked in our recent trip through Alaska without recognizing that Alaska suffers from the great evil of absenteee ownership. Absentee ownership and the evils that inevitably go along with it can thrive best when self-government is denied. Self-government is necessary to check the evils of absentee ownership; and if self-government, which would go along with statehood existed in Alaska, I think there would be discovered within a very few years thereafter a great improvement in Alaska in connection with some of the problems which have been mentioned in this debate by the opponents of statehood. This is generally recognized throughout Alaska, as one talks to the people: they feel that much of their opposition is coming from great financial powers outside Alaska, with tremendous investments within Alaska, who are conducting a program of absentee ownership. I think that is also true to a lesser degree in regard to some of the problems of Hawaii.

The next point that I want to emphasize in this argument for statehood for Alaska and for Hawaii is that I believe we have an opportunity here again to demonstrate to the world that we do not believe in perpetuating a policy of colonialism upon any people when they reach the point in their territorial development where it is safe and proper to relieve them of that colonial policy. I say, Mr. President, that both Hawaii and Alaska have reached that point, and we are called upon, it seems to me, before the bar of public opinion of the world, to practice this great profession of ours that we will not keep a people under colonial control beyond the time that we can be of the greatest assistance to them throughout a colonial policy. We have always proclaimed to the world that we will give the people of an American colony or territory complete self-government as soon as they have reached that territorial development which makes perfectly clear that they are ready to govern themselves. I submit, as my able colleague has so well pointed out this afternoon, that the people of Alaska and of Hawaii have reached that point of territorial development, and that for us longer to keep them under territorial control will, in the eyes of millions of people in the world, make us guilty of perpetuating a policy of colonialism upon a people who are ready to be freed of colonialism.

Thus, I wish to stress that statehood for Alaska and for Hawaii would have tremendous value to the United States in international recognition of our good faith of living up to the principle of self-determination, as well as in demonstrating in practice as in professing that we do not believe in denying self-government to people who are ready for it.

As my colleague has pointed out, I know the argument is made that there is a sparse population in Alaska. Irrespective of which population figure is selected, whether it is the lower figure which I have heard mentioned in this debate, of 112,000, or the figure of 132,000, which I heard throughout Alaska as I talked to the people on my recent trip there, I believe either figure compares well with the total population in some of our present States at the time they were admitted into the Union, including, for example, my own State. It is an adequate population. As my senior colleague mentioned, to point out that there is a concentration of population in only a few areas of Alaska as ground for denying statehood at this time is a very specious and fallacious argument. I say that because I believe if Alaska were granted statehood and given the right to free herself from some of the evils of absentee ownership, with the resulting improvements which would flow from the granting of statehood, such as more adequate transportation and highway system, the population of Alaska would increase rather rapidly. Such has been our experience in connection with other sparsely populated areas which in time past have been granted statehood.

Mr. President, the next argument I wish to make in support of statehood for Alaska and Hawaii is the sound argument of fairness to our fellow citizens.

I believe ordinary fairness and ordinary decent dealing with fellow Americans call for the granting of statehood to Alaska and Hawaii at this time. I do not think it is fair and square to deny to fellow American citizens the right of self-government when they can make as strong a case for self-government as the people of Alaska and Hawaii have made.

I do not care to dwell this afternoon on what motives may be present in the Senate for the parliamentary barricade which has been thrown up in order to prevent a vote upon the two statehood bills in this short session of Congress. I regret what I believe to be those motives. I am a realist, and I have been a realist all along on the whole question of unlimited debate in the Senate. I am realistic enough to know that uncontrolled, unlimited debate in the Senate is the barrier which will prevent a vote on the pending question in this short session of Congress. However, I am hoping that the sense of fair play, which characterizes the inner man of every one of my colleagues in the Senate who is using a parliamentary barricade to prevent a vote on the pending question in this short session of Congress will cause everyone of them to agree that we should come to a vote on it in the next session of Congress which will start in January, after full and fair debate on the merits of the issue. If the experience we are having on this question in the short session of Congress will serve to speed up the opportunity in the next session of Congress to thrash out the question I think some good purpose will be served by the debate in which we are presently engaged.

I am still of the opinion that in view of the complex problems which face our Government in the present era we cannot continue to maintain the present protections which surround our policy of unlimited debate in the Senate. I believe the problems which confront us will be too critical and time too important to permit of absolute unlimited debate.

As was pointed out on the floor of the Senate yesterday afternoon, when we sought to get some action on the railway labor bill, the situation has come to the point where it is difficult to imagine any issue, certainly in the field of social and economic legislation, which could come before the Senate to which a Senator could not attach an amendment that would be offensive to a Senator who does not share the point of view of the junior Senator from Oregon on the subject of civil rights, for example.

I believe that sooner or later—and I believe it will be sooner than most people realize—we shall have to frankly face the question of cloture, and shall have to reexamine it, as I believe we should reexamine all policies of our Government, as they relate to both domestic and foreign issues, to the end of trying to settle the issues upon the facts as we find them to be.

I believe the debate on Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood will make clear to the American people, as it has been made clear heretofore, that the rules of the Senate with regard to cloture will have to be modified in the next session of Congress, so that a strong majority view in the Senate can prevail on any issue. Of course, I am still of the opinion that the type of cloture rule similar to the majority-vote rule which I have fought for ever since I have been a Member of the Senate is the soundest of the solutions which have been suggested. Certainly some solution sounder than the present rule will have to be adopted if we are to avoid, as I think we must avoid, the type of parliamentary barrier which prevents what I am satisfied is a strong majority in the Senate from taking action on the merits of an issue such as the one presently before the Senate.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that if we could get a vote on the merits of the question of statehood for Alaska and Hawaii, statehood would be granted to both Territories, so far as Senate approval was concerned, at least, by a substantial majority of this body.

I believe we weaken democracy, injure self-government, and create a great deal of confusion in the minds of the American people by preventing majority rule from prevailing in the Senate by the adoption of parliamentary tactics which deny a vote on the merits of a question.

Mr. President, I close by saying that, in my opinion, the over-all and controlling reason for statehood for Alaska and Hawaii is that I believe granting statehood is vital to the security and defense of my country. I speak now in my individual capacity as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services which investigated and inspected the defenses of Alaska. It is my personal conclusion that the defenses would never have reached the weakened condition into which they were permitted to get following World War II if the Territory of Alaska had had voting representation in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. I am convinced that if the people of Alaska had been given the precious freedom of self-government which we in the States enjoy, their elected representatives would have brought to the two Houses of Congress the evidence and arguments which would have prevented Congress from figuratively sticking its head in the sand while the great defenses of Alaska were permitted to become so weakened following World War II that up to a few months ago some of them could be described as having been dismantled.

Mr. President, I wish to say that, in my opinion, the security and the welfare of 160,000,000 American citizens have been jeopardized by the weakening of the defenses of Alaska. What has happened in Alaska during the last year has been nothing short of miraculous, when at long last we became aware of the weakened condition of the defenses and again moved in with a program of strengthening the defenses of Alaska.

I am not privileged, and it would not be proper for me, to discuss on the floor of the Senate this afternoon the information which our subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee gathered in regard not only to the present status of Alaskan defenses, but as to what has been done in Alaska during the last 10- or 11-month period in strengthening those defenses. I do want to say to the American people here this afternoon that I think each one of them should offer up a prayer to Almighty God for the heroic service that is being rendered in Alaska right now, this hour, by thousands of members of our armed services, under living and service conditions which not a single Member of this body would be proud of if he had a chance to observe those conditions.

We are greatly indebted to those men in the armed services in Alaska who stand ready at a moment's notice to make the great sacrifice which will be theirs the moment the Russian air force moves off of Siberia toward the United States. In the same spirit we should offer up a fervent prayer tonight to Almighty God for the great service and heroic sacrifices which thousands upon thousands of American boys are making this very hour in Korea, sacrifices which in my opinion needed not to be as great as they are if we, the people of the United States, had, since World War II followed a realistic course in regard to America's defenses, and if we had done the things in the Congress of the United States necessary to get this country of ours so strong that Stalin would always have understood that he had everything to lose and nothing to gain from conducting the type of aggressive foreign policy which has characterized him since the end of World War II. Likewise the officials in the executive branch of the Government have failed to adopt a realistic program with respect to the defense needs of America.

Oh, how shortsighted we have been. It was known—no Member of Congress can deny the fact, no Member of the administration can deny the fact—that as we proceeded with a program of demobilization and disarmament, as we economized at the expense of the adequate defense of America, Russia was devoting her major economy and effort to the building up of her armed forces.

Now at long last we come to face the stark, cold reality that if the all-out war should come as soon as tomorrow, our sacrifices would be tremendous, and far in excess of what they needed to be had we not followed what I consider was a shortsighted policy of inadequate defense since the close of World War II.

Mr. President, I speak not from hindsight, because as a member of the Armed Services Committee, along with my colleagues on that committee, I assert that committee has been strong for more adequate defense throughout the whole period of demobilization and disarmament. As a member of that committee, I say that we as a Congress must proceed now to do everything that must be done in order to strengthen the defenses of this country. In my opinion, we must proceed with an all-out, full-scale military and economiic mobilization program, and we must stop the ghastly mistakes of vacillation and delay in facing the realities of the present situation.

We in the Congress have something to answer for, in my opinion, in regard to this crisis. I think we wasted precious time last July, August, and September in respect to a great many of the defense matters, because I think it was as clear then as it it is now that the crisis was an exceedingly serious one. We must find out now whether or not Russia intends war or peace.

Mr. President, our leaders must stop keeping some kind of a hood tied over their eyes through which they see very dimly the realities of the world picture. As a matter of fact we are at war now, and have been for months, because Russia's policies for months in the field of international relations toward the United States have not been the policies of a friendly nation. She has followed, I think quite openly, a course of action which can receive no other adequate description than as a course of action of carrying on a form of armed conflict against us by backing up various satellite countries which have carried on direct action against us. Russia herself has been guilty not only of supplying them with the materials, with the finances, and the military advice, and sometimes leadership, for their course of armed action, but also in the United Nations, both in the Security Council and in the General Assembly, she has followed a course of action which has made very clear time and time again that she has not been a friendly nation toward us, but one really acting in a hostile manner. The ugly fact is that Russia has been carrying on a type of war against us for many months.

Mr. President, that has been my position in this matter for months and months, and as a member of the Armed Services Committee I have never failed to give support to programs which sought to strengthen the security of our country.

In pleading this afternoon for Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood I wish to say that in my judgment statehood for those Territories will strengthen America's defenses. They will strengthen America's defenses in a variety of ways. They will strengthen America's defenses insofar as morale in those two Territories is concerned. They will strengthen the defenses in that the strength that will flow from statehood will result in some very valuable cooperative action on the part of those two Territories in the whole matter of civilian defense, as well as military defense itself.

Mr. President, I think they will strengthen the security of America because their recognition as States will again demonstrate to the world that we intend to put into practice the principles of the United Nations Charter, which we solemnly adopted in this body by ratification in 1945.

So, Mr. President, I look upon the bills for statehood for Alaska and Hawaii as great symbols of the intention of the Congress of the United States to meet, without any reservations whatsoever, what I consider to be our solemn obligation in this hour of crisis to do everything that is necessary to help strengthen the security of all the people of the United States.

For these main reasons I am pleased to place myself on public record here this afternoon in support of statehood for Alaska and Hawaii, and as pleading for an early vote on the merits of the issue.

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I realize it is impossible for me to add anything to the forceful and impressive arguments which have already been made in behalf of statehood for Alaska. I believe that about everything that has been said in the arguments advanced against the admission of Alaska was said against the admission of Montana into the Union. Montana was admitted to the Union on November 8, 1889. I know that many people at that time thought that about all Montana had was a great many Indians and snow-covered mountains. We did have many Indians and we did have snow covered mountains. But we had a few people who had migrated into that Territory, who had built their homes there, were rearing families, and intended to proceed to develop the country for their children and children's children.

Three years ago I was one of several members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs who visited Alaska. I then discovered that Alaska had snow-covered mountains and also had many Indians, and Eskimos as well. We do not happen to have Eskimos in Montana. We found likewise a people in Alaska who had migrated there, people with courage, with ambition, with vision, who were building homes, and rearing families, and who intended to stay in Alaska if possible.

We found that many people from my own State had gone to Alaska. I suppose life in Montana had become too easy for them, so they wanted to go to Alaska to satisfy the old pioneering spirit. They were doing good work there. But back in their minds they hoped for the time when eventually Alaska would become a State. That has been in the minds of the people there for years and years and years. I was surprised to meet as many persons as I did who thought it was essential that Alaska be admitted to the Union, with all the rights of statehood.

Mr. President, I talked to a great many GI's who had been in Alaska during World War II, and who had returned there, bringing their brides with them, and were attempting to make a home there and provide for themselves a livelihood. Many of them told me, however, "We do not expect to stay here all our lives." I asked, "Why?" They said, "This is a Territory. We simply do not like to raise our children to maturity in a Territory. It is all right for them to stay here for a while, but after a bit they will want to go to school, and we will have to make arrangements to go back to the States. Now, if you Members of Congress would give us statehood we think we would be willing to stay here and make it our home for the future. We can develop this country just as those in the West have developed their States, which at the time of statehood were sparsely settled." A great many of them felt that it would mean much to them and to their children if they could say they were citizens of the State of Alaska rather than of the Territory of Alaska. That made a deep impression upon us.

Mr. President, I met in Alaska the finest kind of people I have met anywhere in the world. They are friendly, they are generous, they are hard-working, and they are most forward-looking.

I do not believe we need to worry about whether the resources of Alaska are sufficient to support statehood. In my opinion, Alaska has practically everything that any other State of the Union has except agriculture, and Alaska is developing agriculturally. Under modern methods of using various kinds of soils under differing climatic conditions, I believe eventually Alaska will have a pretty good agriculture, and will develop agriculturally as well as in other ways.

I believe Alaska has more resources than most of the other States of the Union have at the present time. The Senator from Oregon mentioned the natural resources of Alaska. Natural resources abound in Alaska. Nearly every kind of mineral that can be imagined is hidden away in the mountains and the hills and the valleys of Alaska.

Mr. President, I am happy that years ago someone had the foresight to secure Alaska as a Territory for the United States. In the face of the world situation as it is, and knowing of all the strategic materials we need to protect ourselves in this modern age, I am glad that we have the Territory of Alaska under our control.

In view of the fact that the people of that Territory have been promised statehood for so many years, and have been on trial for so many years, since at least a majority of them have worked earnestly and continuously for advancement to statehood, and in view of the fact that the Alaska statehood bill has already been passed by the House twice, that we have for 2 years held long and tedious public hearings on the subject, and that the Senate committee has seen fit to advance it to the floor of the Senate, I had hoped that we could have the bill brought before the Senate, at least so a vote could be had on it, in order to let the people of Alaska see the real picture.

Mr. President, when I was in Alaska 3 years ago I told the people there that I honestly thought statehood legislation could be put through the Congress of the United States. They wanted to know why. I said, "Because in my opinion you occupy the most strategic place on the face of the globe. From a military standpoint all eyes are going to be turned on Alaska in the next few years. I think we are going to recognize your strategic position and realize that we can do a better job if Alaska is a State of the Union, rather than merely a Territory."

Mr. President, I merely wish to say this evening that I honestly believe that Alaska is the key to the proper defense of the North American continent, that it is the key spot on the map where will be determined in the future whether we shall have world peace or not.

Mr. President, now all our eyes are turned on Korea. That is all very well. Korea, however, is not the key to Asia. Korea is not the key to the peace of the world. I say in all sincerity and honesty that I believe Alaska, our own Territory, which belongs to the United States, is the key. I agree with the Senator from Oregon that we had better be spending our time and our money in making plans for any eventuality, because in my opinion Alaska is the pinnacle of the world.

Senators may say, as I have heard it said here, "Well, what if it is? We will defend Alaska." Of course, we are going to defend Alaska whether it is a Territory or a State. It belongs to us. The people of Alaska are a part of us, even though they live in a Territory, and even though they cannot vote for national officers, and even though they do not have representation in Congress, except through one delegate, whom they elect, but who has no vote in Congress.

It is no secret that Russia is putting forth propaganda that the United States bought Alaska years ago too cheaply, and that rightfully and justly Alaska should belong to Russia. Mr. President, the good people of Alaska hear those stories and are worried by them. Inasmuch as Alaska now is merely a Territory, some of her people wonder whether perhaps if the going became tough, the United States would move out and would let them go, rather than put up a fierce battle and possibly involve the entire world.

Mr. President, I say to you that we need to do everything we possibly can to build up the morale of the good citizens who live in Alaska. We should make them understand that they are full-fledged American citizens, with all the rights, privileges, and protections of American citizens, and that they are supported by the determination of a great Government to see that they are protected. That will help their morale; it will give them additional courage; and they, in turn, will give greater morale to the thousands of our citizens who, as members of the Armed Forces, have to be stationed in Alaska.

Mr. President, the towns in Alaska and the homes in Alaska remind me a great deal of towns and cities and homes in my own State of Montana. Naturally, the houses in Alaska have to be built well in order to withstand the cold, but they look very much like houses in any other modern city or town. Alaska in the total respect is not the wilderness it is sometimes portrayed to be.

Alaska possesses some of the most beautiful scenery in the world. If we admit Alaska to the Union as a full-fledged State I think that eventually there will be a paved highway between this country, across Canada, to Alaska; and every summer many of our citizens will wish to travel there, instead of going to Europe, South America, or some other foreign land. I do not see how anyone could find in Switzerland or in any other foreign country any sights more beautiful than those which can be found in Alaska.

Mr. President, a large delegation of Alaskans came to Washington and appeared before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and we went into every detail in regard to what will be involved if Alaska is granted statehood. I know that there are arguments in opposition; but the splendid group of people who came here last winter and who were honest and sincere had given the problem much serious consideration. They are united in believing that Alaska, if admitted to the Union as a State, will be able to finance herself and will be able to overcome all obstacles. They recognize that there are certain obstacles to be overcome if Alaska is granted statehood; but they wish to try, they wish to go forward, they wish to accept the challenge and the responsibility. They are certain they can manage it. I believe they can; and I believe they will if they are granted the opportunity to do so.

Mr. President, I am sorry that certain aspects of the matter have developed in the course of the argument and the effort to bring this bill before the Senate for consideration. In that connection I am not blaming anyone. I know how certain Senators feel about the balance of power and other questions. However, I do not think we need worry about that; I think all those matters can be taken care of. I believe that any Senators or Members of the House of Representatives who might be elected from Alaska and sent to the United States Congress would be fair and open-minded, and would not take undue advantage of anyone. I am not fearful of that situation. Knowing the people of Alaska as I believe I do, I have confidence that they would elect as representatives of the State of Alaska Senators and Representatives who would be fair, open-minded, and sound on all questions of national interest.

Therefore, Mr. President, I wish the RECORD to show that I have not changed my mind since I was in Alaska 3 years ago, when I promised those good people that I would support their statehood bill; and I am supporting it now.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am about to move a recess, but before doing so, I desire to express my appreciation of the notable contributions which have been made this afternoon to the arguments in support of the statehood bills by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON]; his colleague, the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]; the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE]; and the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. ECTON], who has just taken his seat.

The senior Senator from Oregon spoke knowingly and feelingly of taxation without representation as it applies to the people of these Territories. There has just come to my knowledge an incident which shows that it is far more than taxation without representation; it is military service, it is conscription, without representation.

Early this week there appeared at the office of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs a delegation of 28 citizens of Hawaii, who came to the continental United States and to the Capitol of the Nation in the fond hope that before this session had adjourned, they would be able to witness the passage by the Senate of the bill extending statehood to the Territory of Hawaii. Among that group was a native Hawaiian, Col. Peter Pakele, who served as a second lieutenant in World War I; who was lieutenant colonel of the Hawaii National Guard at the outbreak of World War II; who became Provost Marshal of Hawaii on December 7, 1941, the day of the attack on Pearl Harbor; and who thereafter became commanding officer of the Hawaiian Home Guard. Colonel Pakele is leaving Washington tomorrow, to go to Santa Clara University, in California, to see his son, also a native Hawaiian, before the latter is inducted under the draft law of the United States to serve in the Army of the United States, possibly on the Korean peninsula. The father, who has served his country, and the son, who is about to serve his country also in the military service, stand in grave danger of not receiving news from Washington that statehood will be extended to the Territory in which they live, but of learning that they will continue to have no voice in the action of Congress in levying taxes upon their incomes and upon their property and in levying the draft upon their sons.

Mr. President, I now move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, December 4, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 1 (legislative day of November 27), 1950:

DIRECTOR OF PRICE STABILIZATION

Michael V. Di Salle, of Ohio, to be Director of Price Stabilization.

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL

Holmes Baldridge, of Oklahoma, to be an Assistant Attorney General to fill an existing vacancy.

IN THE NAVY

Vice Adm. Edwin D. Foster, Supply Corps, United States Navy, when retired, to be placed on the retired list with the rank of vice admiral.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COOPER.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

DECEMBER 1, 1950.

I hereby designate Hon. JERE COOPER to act as Speaker pro tempore today.

SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most merciful and gracious God, who hast been our strength in ages past and art our only hope for years to come, we are again lifting our hearts in unison beseeching Thee for wisdom and guidance as we face difficult tasks and responsibilities in this needy and war-torn world.

We pray that Thou wilt bless all councils and assemblies and conferences which are seeking to promote the spirit of amity and concord among the nations of the earth. May the deliberations and decisions of the leaders and representatives of our own beloved country help to establish a commonwealth of freemen, strong and great in the fear of God, loving righteousness and walking in the ways of peace.

Inspire rulers and people everywhere with a longing to solve the problems of human relationship upon the high level of a hallowed respect for the sanctity of human rights and liberties and a Christ-like reverence for the worth and dignity of the soul of man created in Thine own image and destined for immortal life.

To Thy name we ascribe all the praise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INFLATION

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, the greatest enemy of this country, the greatest threat to our security and survival, is not communism; it is inflation. Increased wages and increased prices continue to follow each other in a vicious circle, and the American dollar continues to shrink. If our economy collapses under this assault, as it may well do, then we become an easy prey to barbarism, and our children will become slaves of Communist tyranny. We talk of the terror of the atom bomb; a greater danger is that we will be atomized by inflation. The impelling question we must now answer is: Shall we permit the life savings of our people to be burned up in the raging fires of uncontrolled inflation?

Today's press carries the story that our gigantic steel industry is granting a substantial wage increase to its employees. No effort is being made to stop other big industries from doing the same thing. Each group in this country wants the other group to hold the line while they get an unfair cut from our inflated economic melon.

The administration has the power to hold the wage-price line. If the administration will not act now, this Congress, before adjourning, should enact mandatory legislation against further wage and price increases. Surely we are not so lacking in courage or intelligence as to permit this gruesome game of self-destruction to go on unimpeded.

STALIN'S REPRESENTATIVE: MAX LOWENTHAL

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, back on September 1, I made a speech on the floor exposing the many Communist connections of one Max Lowenthal. Since then Lowenthal's smear book on the Federal Bureau of Investigation has been published and there has been much discussion of the book on the floor of this House.

I now wish to bring to the attention of the Members the fact that Lowenthal's book has finally received the acclaim it richly deserves. Yesterday's issue of the Daily Worker, the official organ of the Communist Party in this country, made the following statement:

> The Gestapo-like menace of the FBI to the democratic freedom of all Americans has been too well documented in the current book on the FBI by Max Lowenthal.

That comment makes clear, if there had ever been any doubt, that Lowenthal's book is serving the cause of Moscow. Stalin must be well pleased with Lowenthal.

ARMING OUR ENEMIES TO BE PAID FOR WITH THE BLOOD OF OUR BOYS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if this administration is incapable of learning from experience. It would seem so to those of us who protested against the arming of Japan with our scrap iron, copper, tin, oil, airplane engines, ships, and tanks. There could have been no war in the Pacific had it not been for the arming of the enemy. Those of our boys who are now dead would probably be living normal, happy lives had the United States not armed Japan. Now the ghastly tragedy is being repeated in Korea. Russia is being armed from our own arsenals. Our boys are paying a ghastly price for the irresponsibility of the Truman administration, the same as our boys did when we armed Japan. Not alone this, but our allies are arming our enemies. It is hopeless for a minority to get results by protesting, but the awakening conscience of the American people will have to take a stand on this issue, otherwise this administration will continue to arm our enemies and thus contribute to the destruction of our fine young men.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting an article published in the Reader's Digest of November 1950, entitled "When Are We Going To Stop Helping Russia Arm?"

WHEN ARE WE GOING TO STOP HELPING RUSSIA ARM?—TOO MUCH STRATEGIC MATERIAL IS GOING LEGALLY FROM WESTERN EUROPE AND ILLEGALLY FROM THE UNITED STATES

(By O. K. Armstrong and Frederic Sondern, Jr.)

During 1950 the merchants and industries of Western Europe will have contributed, legally, almost a billion dollars' worth of machinery and materials to the war potential of the Soviet Union and its satellites. Factories in the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and even Western Germany—many of which have been rebuilt or retooled with the help of ECA dollars—continue to provide ball bearings, lathes, drill presses, special steels, with which the plants of Magnitogorsk and Kuibyshev turn out guns, tanks, and warplanes.

To this flood of material going to Russia legally there will have been added much more which is smuggled across borders. Some of it comes from the United States.

When it became apparent 3 years ago that the Soviet leaders would not cooperate to establish world peace, Congress remembered the lessons we learned from our shipments of scrap iron to Japan and our foolhardy trade with Nazi Germany before Pearl Harbor. It took steps to prevent a repetition of such mistakes.

Shipment of all arms and ammunition aboard was prohibited except under specific license by the State Department Exports of potential war materials, which were named, would require licenses from the Department of Commerce. Abroad, the Economic Cooperation Administration was ordered to stop delivery of Marshall plan goods to any country which was reshipping them to Communist territory. The use of ECA machinery and materials to produce goods for export to the east was also prohibited. In a long series of negotiations, the State Department tried to get the Western European governments to agree to place an embargo similar to the American one on shipments to Communist areas.

The promises from the European capitals receiving ECA aid were many; but they have not been well kept. Almost all the Western European nations maintain trade agreements with Russia and its satellite states. They have been accustomed to trading with these countries for many years, and the imports they receive from the east are important to them. Also, their definitions of potential war materials have differed from ours. Hence, this year Britain alone will have dispatched to Russia and Eastern Europe some $120,000,000 worth of goods, much of which Washington considers of high strategic value. Sweden, the Netherlands, France, Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland follow close behind.

This open trade is officially sanctioned by treaties and duly reported to the United States. The Russians have another, clandestine, source of supply. To circumvent American export and ECA transshipment controls, Soviet agents use bribery and even murder.

On the morning of October 31, 1948, the body of Irving Ross, an official of our ECA headquarters in Austria, was found in a field on the outskirts of Vienna. He had been brutally murdered, his head smashed to a pulp. Nearby lay the freshly bloodied and shattered butt plates of a Russian machine pistol.

On the previous evening, as the United States provost marshal's investigation finally revealed, Ross was driving home an acquaintance who lived in the Russian sector of the city when a jeep suddenly forced him to the curb. Four men piled out, wrenched open the doors, and crowded into the car. "That way, very fast," barked one of them, pointing with his pistol. As Ross, with a gun muzzle at his neck, sped down the Triesterstrasse his companion was hurled from the car. Our provost, blocked at every turn by suddenly blind and deaf Soviet policemen, could get no further with finding the killers. But Washington well knew the cause of the murder.

Ross had been investigating the activities of certain Western European firms who were shipping goods exported to them under the Marshall plan to destinations behind the iron curtain. He was a legitimate diplomatic representative and no cloak-and-dagger spy, but he had stumbled on an important section of the Russian network of buyers who operate in Europe to funnel strategically valuable materials into Russian industry. He was getting to know, by patient research, the names, methods and organization of the key men in Vienna—Russia's most important commercial contact point with the west. The Soviet's Vienna bureau in charge of these matters evidently decided that such knowledge if transmitted to Washington might prove embarrassing. Russian agents play rough with people—diplomats or not—who get too close to their vital secrets.

The west-east smuggling operation is probably the biggest in the history of this ancient business. The United States High Commission in Germany estimates that more than $200,000,000 worth of highly critical products have found their way illegally into Communist territory every year for the past 4 years, from Western Germany alone. The hopelessly understaffed Western German customs and frontier guard, which can barely manage to inspect one out of every 50 freight cars and every tenth truck crossing into Eastern Germany, is no match for the well-organized, Soviet-financed gangs which run this lucrative and fantastic business.

One such gang, stopped by the German police recently after many months of careful detective work, is a good example of the racketeering organizations at work all over Europe. This particular combine, with headquarters in Frankfurt, branch offices in Vienna and Milan, and correspondents in Bern, Paris, Stockholm, London, and New York, was headed by four men: a German, a Hungarian, an Englishman, and a Swede. Even the German police, accustomed to large-scale skulduggery, were startled by the magnitude of their transactions; single shipments were worth a million dollars and more. The German leader of the ring got his orders directly from a Russian control point in Berlin.

If tires that Moscow wanted, for example, could be bought in Western Germany, they would be purchased there for delivery to the ring's warehouse near the border. There they would be packed into cases labeled "scrap rubber" and sent by rail into the Soviet zone, where a Russian representative would readdress them to their final destination in the U. S. S. R. If the tires were not obtainable in Germany, one of the partners would make the necessary arrangements in Switzerland, France, England, or even the United States to ship the goods to Germany.

Smaller and more critical materials, such as ball bearings or precision measuring instruments, were packed into trucks manned by heavily armed guards with whom the frontier guards rarely chose to tangle. One night, however, a German customs man who wanted to do his duty and became inquisitive over some cases labeled "preserves" was shot, and the police decided to do something about his murder. The chief muscle men of the gang were captured, and they told the story of the operation. The four head men, however, are still at large.

"And that's the way it is," one ECA man told me, "up and down the border. You can't rightly call it smuggling, it's so easy. The stuff we're trying to keep from Russia is just pouring across those frontiers every day."

In every major industrial city of Western Europe buyers subsidized by Soviet funds—often firms of the highest international reputation—serve the needs of Moscow's planners and their assistants in the satellite countries. Their profits are big. While the inefficiency of Russian industry has been greatly exaggerated, the relatively small number of engineers and expert mechanics in the U. S. S. R. cannot yet turn out certain machinery and metals in sufficient quantity to satisfy the enormous demands of Russian factories. Moscow is willing to pay far above the world price for these essentials—either in cash or kind. The Western European countries need Russian and Eastern European timber, fats, wheat, manganese. So they keep their export controls lax, often wink when they are violated.

Not long ago the Department of Commerce received an application from a well-known firm of American exporters to permit the shipment of three Worthington pavers to Switzerland. These are immense machines, costing about $40,000, which pave a road or an airstrip with incredible speed. Because of their high military value, they are on the list of items which must be licensed for shipment anywhere and may not be consigned behind the iron curtain under any circumstances. But the Swiss importer convinced the United States firm that he was sincere in his promise that the pavers would remain in that country, our State Department was satisfied that all was in order, and Commerce granted the license. A few weeks later, however, the Commerce Department's enforcement branch—the understaffed and overworked agents of the Office of Industry and Commerce—received a tip from a European informant. Washington then alerted one of our attachés in Vienna, who hurried to the Austrian-German border at Salzburg. And sure enough, there were the three Worthington pavers, on freight cars en route from Switzerland to Budapest and the East. The Swiss Government explained that the pavers had never actually entered Switzerland, but went to the free port of Basel, and were transshipped to the East. The pavers will now be sold to an Italian firm with the approval of the American military government in Austria.

Last May a shipment of 144 barrels of molybdenum—a substance used to harden steel for jet engines, among other modern military devices—was duly licensed by the Commerce Department and left New York for Liverpool, consigned to a reputable British merchant. Again the C-men received a tip: The metal was to be transferred at Liverpool to the Russian freighter Beloostrov. Commerce cabled the American Embassy in London to prevent any transshipment, but the Embassy hesitated to precipitate an incident and the molybdenum was soon aboard the Beloostrov and on its way across the North Sea.

While neither of the American export firms involved in these cases knew where its shipment was ultimately going, the OIC's special agents keep catching exporters who do know. Some 80 concerns have been punished in the last 2 years for misrepresenting the final destination of strategic materials prohibited to the Communist areas. Not long ago Allied-Universal, a New York import-export firm, applied for a permit to ship 200,000 pounds of silicon-steel sheets to a company in the Netherlands for the manufacture of electric motors to be used in war-damaged factories of that country. The C-men, in a routine check-up, discovered not only that Allied-Universal's declaration was false but that the Dutch consignee had told the exporter that he intended to transship the steel directly to Hungary. Allied-Universal had replied that it didn't care where the steel went as long as it was paid for. This shipment was caught just in time; the steel stayed in the United States, and Allied-Universal was put out of business for 6 months by a United States Commissioner who suspended its export-license privileges.

In recent months the Commerce Department has finally begun to treat these offenders with some severity. A dozen exporters have been sent to jail for terms ranging from 3 months to 10 years, and almost 50 more criminal cases are pending. The Department is also putting more punch into its suspensions. The Edwards International Corp. of New York, which tried to export 3,000 truck tires to Rumania via Italy, was banned from European trade for 2 years. Another New York merchant dispatched to the U. S. S. R., through an agent in Switzerland, 20 tons of a chemical essential in the hardening of rubber. He was suspended from all trade abroad that requires licensing for the duration of our controls.

But the Office of Industry and Commerce has little more than a dozen enforcement officers to ride herd over the enormous volume of our export business. With at least a thousand important shipments of licensed goods a month from the Port of New York alone, they can given attention to only the most suspicious transactions. With devotion, often brilliant police work, and a round-the-clock schedule of work, this handful of men has prevented $150,000,000 worth of strategic materials from reaching the U. S. S. R. in the last 2 years. They themselves assume that they must have missed shipments totaling a good deal more.

Abroad, the position of the ECA men charged with preventing the U. S. S. R. from taking advantage of the Marshall plan is even more difficult. They have no trained investigators at all. While the ECA is supposed, under our law, to penalize a government which tolerates trade in strategic materials with the U. S. S. R., it refuses to use any kind of big stick for fear of arousing resentment which the Russians might turn to political advantage. Many European businessmen accordingly have been quick to take advantage of that fact.

"I recently looked at a French plant, rebuilt with ECA funds," one ECA official with long experience in Europe told me. "They were making lathes for Poland. And they were perfectly frank about it. Lathes are not strategic machines according to French rules, they pointed out, and the product was not actually going to Russia. In their opinion, that made everything all right." The ECA man had submitted his report. "But the factory is still making lathes for Poland," he continued bitterly, "and if lathes aren't strategic machines and Poland isn't behind the Iron Curtain, I don't know what is."

Mounting criticism of the Government's policies in regard to western Europe's trade with the Communist countries has provoked the suggestion in Congress that ECA aid be withdrawn from any country trading with Russia in any material on our contraband list. That proposal was voted down at the last session after President Truman, the ECA and the State and Commerce Departments all objected that such radical action would do us irreparable harm in Europe.

The State Department claims that negotiations with the governments participating in ECA are bringing about an amicable arrangement with regard to shipments to the U. S. S. R. But Commerce Department figures on west-east trade indicate no change. It would seem that the new Congress and the public should have a careful look at the extent of our military aid to Russia.

COMMUNICATION FROM MR. K. C. WU

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, the Governor of Formosa is a man by the name of K. C. Wu, who spent several years of his early life in Iowa as a student at Grinnell College. Formosa, as we all know, is the seat of the Nationalist Government. Governor Wu, with the background of an Iowa education and several years spent in the environment of Iowa, of course, could have no part of communism in his make-up. He is a very sound statesman. I have a recent letter from him, in which he describes his efforts to establish representative government and government by elected public officers in the Taiwan Province of China. We are very anxious to aid the forces against communism in the Orient at this time. I feel certain that the Members of the House and particularly the members of the Foreign Relations Committee will be interested in this letter from Governor Wu, an alumnus of Grinnell College, the class of 1923, and whom I know personally, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that his letter may be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

I am having the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD sent to Governor Wu so that he may be acquainted with developments in Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

(The letter is as follows:)

TAIWAN PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT,
Taipeh, Taiwan, China, November 23, 1950.

Mr. KARL M. LECOMPTE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

DEAR MR. LECOMPTE: Your letter dated November 3 has been duly received. I am very grateful to you for your assistance in making arrangements to have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD mailed to me regularly.

I must also thank you for your kind expression of good will. There is no denying the fact that we have been confronted with many difficulties in these crucial times. During the past year we have been doing our best to overcome these difficulties, and I am sure you will be glad to know that our efforts have met with considerable success. As a result of the measures we have taken, including the appointment of more Taiwanese leaders to serve in the Government, curbing of inflation, control of commodity prices, increase of agricultural and industrial production, improvement of the tax system, issuance of liberty bonds, reduction of land rentals, and enforcement of labor insurance, we have achieved political, economic, and social stability. The achievement of stability has enabled us to maintain peace and order throughout the island and increase Taiwan's security against Communist invasion. The people are contented and the morale of the armed forces is very high.

You may also be interested to know that we have already made a good start in inaugurating the popular election of officials of the local governments. During the last few months elections of district magistrates and members of municipal councils have been successfully held in various parts of Taiwan. The elections were free in every sense of the word. There was not the slightest interference from the governmental authorities, and great enthusiasm was displayed by both the candidates and the voters. We are highly gratified with the success thus far attained, which undoubtedly augurs well for the future of popular government in China.

Another thing I should like to tell you is that we are placing great stress on rule of law. The Government has directed that the liberties of the individual must be respected, and all persons tried in military courts will soon be permitted to have legal counsel. For many decades China's judicial system, in both theory and practice, has largely been dominated by the concepts of continental law, but now we have begun to adopt and emphasize the principles of Anglo-Saxon law, which holds that a man must be considered innocent until he is proved guilty.

Before closing I must add that in the achievement of stability on Taiwan we have been greatly benefited by American assistance, ECA aid has been particularly useful in the solution of our economic problems. There can be no doubt that with the American people's generous support, both moral and material, we shall not fail to tide over the present crisis and contribute our share to the democratic nations' joint efforts for checking Communist expansion.

Thanking you again for your letter and your sympathy, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

K. C. WU.

REPORT FROM THE RULES COMMITTEE

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Rules Committee may have until midnight tonight to file a report on an application for a rule on the tax bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

REPORTS FROM THE LOBBYING INVESTIGATION COMMITTEE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, prior to election the Buchanan committee on lobbying put out propaganda complaining about Republicans who were sending out material under frank, which of course was frankable, but which was critical of the New Deal and the Communists.

The press has carried the statement that a member of that committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. DOYLE], franked out four issues of a pamphlet containing labor propaganda against Republicans. I wonder if the gentleman from California [Mr. DOYLE], who is on the floor, or the committee will give us a report on that matter. While they are doing that, will they look up and see if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN] did not frank out some other Democratic propaganda. I am not critical of either of these gentlemen nor of what they did or did not do—my purpose is to have the whole story of record, for the Buchanan committee created and circulated the impression that members were doing something illegal or improper when they were not. Another purpose is to show how easy it is for material to be franked out through mistake. I am sure the gentleman from California [Mr. DOYLE] can and will satisfactorily explain the situation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

REPORTS FROM LOBBY INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], I think I should answer right now; so as to stop a lot of false reports that were started by Fulton Lewis and by a certain newspaper reporter in Washington. Here is the fact which I ascertained, and today or tomorrow I shall be privileged to file, I think upon request, a statement by my executive secretary who had charge of such matters.

What happened, I am told by my executive secretary over her own signature—and I do not have that statement with me this morning because I did not realize the gentleman from Michigan was going to bring it up—but what happened, she reports to me, was that we had a policy in my office prior to the time I went back to California of mailing an A. F. of L. pamphlet of which we received a hundred copies for several weeks, but not under frank; but paying postage on them instead. When my executive secretary and No. 2 secretary and I all went back to California at recess before election date, we left in the office a junior secretary. We had asked that the A. F. of L. weekly, and all newspapers and such mail, 100 copies of which came to us a week, be transferred to my Long Beach office so that they could be used out there. A letter came from my junior secretary, addressed to the Long Beach office, asking what should be done with this accumulation of 3 or 4 weeks' issues of the A. F. of L. pamphlet which we did not know were being sent to the Washington office during the recent recess. I did not know of the inquiry coming.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOYLE. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is a perfectly satisfactory explanation. I just wanted to clear the record of any doubt. That could happen to any of us or all of us. The charges made by the Buchanan committee against members are as easily and as satisfactorily explainable.

Mr. DOYLE. Let me continue for 1 minute more, with unanimous consent. We ascertained that this was the fact: My executive secretary, Miss Smith, answered to my junior secretary to mail those out. There was plenty of postage on hand in the Washington office. The junior secretary here at Washington mailed this A. F. of L. weekly to only 85 people, but she did mail the accumulation of 3 or 4 weeks. In other words, three or four hundred copies went to 85 people. Immediately upon its being discovered what had happened in the Long Beach office, I ordered that the postage be paid on those 85 mailings. It was immediately paid. There was no general mailing; it was one mailing to 85 people only, and certainly it was not done with my knowledge, my approval, or my consent. Neither I nor my executive secretary were in Washington.

Because these mailing details did not generally come to my attention, I asked my executive secretary to give me a signed statement as soon as she learned what the fact was. Following is a true and correct copy of an original statement by her under date of November 14, 1950:

LONG BEACH, CALIF., November 14, 1950.

As executive secretary for Congressman CLYDE DOYLE throughout the Eighty-first Congress, and on account of the criticism which has been directed toward him regarding the use of the frank, I am making the following statement:

I left Washington for California on Thursday, August 31, 1950. At that time the League Reporter was being mailed to approximately 85 people, postage prepaid and not under the frank. This number was not increased and neither was this policy changed. I did not know that any of them were being mailed under the frank after I left. This detail was never brought to the Congressman's attention. No matches were mailed.

When the Congressman was informed that the frank had been used to these 83 people on this one mailing, he immediately instructed me to remit the postage, which I have done.

RENE SEBRING SMITH,
Executive Secretary to Clyde Doyle, Member of Congress, Eighteenth Congressional District of California.

USE THE ATOM BOMB

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, ever since the atom bomb was first conceived, Americans have debated when and where and under what circumstances it should be used against the enemy.

Personally, I have always had a horror of this deadly weapon. I have maintained it should never be used against civilians and noncombatants. It should not be resorted to except under the most trying conditions, which might mean the end of our very national existence unless we brought the atom bomb into play.

Probably there has never been such a wide divergence of views upon how effective the atom bomb really is. Those who delivered Japan the atomic blow which compelled her leaders to capitulate, claim that no power on earth can withstand this dread missile.

On the other hand, Jimmy Doolittle held there was not much more puissance in a standard-size atom bomb than in one giant blockbuster or in a ton of TNT.

Be that as it may, the atom bomb is still largely a secret weapon, the mere mention of which is capable of creating fear. Since it has never been brought out except on two or three momentous occasions, it is only natural we should decide to use it with the extremest regard.

But the news from Korea is black for 100,000 American boys there, struggling in deathly combat with hordes of savage fighters, and outnumbered 3 to 1 by the Chinese Communists.

If using the atom bomb means saving these young Americans in Korea, then I am all for using as many atom bombs as we need and just as soon as we can. Let us destroy the forces of evil which are slaughtering patriotic Americans and defend our soldiers with everything at our command.

I do not know of any greater exigency than when Uncle Sam's armies are threatened with annihilation. That is what will happen unless we go to their rescue. I say use the atom bomb in their defense.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include excerpts from the appendix of the report of the Dies Committee on Un-American Activities.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the majority leader if there has been any change in the program for next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am glad the gentleman from Indiana asked that question. There will be a change. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has introduced the tax bill that will be considered. The Ways and Means Committee has scheduled a meeting for 2 o'clock. If that committee reports a bill, the Committee on Rules will meet at 3 o'clock for the purpose of reporting a rule. If a rule is reported out, midnight tonight having been obtained for the purpose of filing that rule, by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], in view of the importance of such legislation I would feel constrained to program it for Monday.

The other bill programed for consideration on Monday is on the program and will be taken up. Of course, every one, I am sure, appreciates the fact that legislation of more far reaching importance should be given preference when available for the consideration of the House. So in answer to the gentleman's inquiry, if the Ways and Means Committee reports out a bill and the Rules Committee reports a rule, which I reasonably expect, then the tax bill will be considered on Monday.

Mr. HALLECK. One further question that possibly the majority leader might answer for the benefit of the membership. He will recall that he and I discussed the matter of a roll call on Monday and had agreed there would be no roll call on Monday. That is, if we had a roll call we would endeavor to put it over until Tuesday. I take it, of course, that the time of voting on the tax bill, if it is taken up on Monday, will be dependent on the length of general debate granted under the rule. The majority leader will agree with me that in all probability the debate will be such that the vote will not come on Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am glad the gentleman from Indiana asked that question, because we did have an understanding with reference to the bill programed for Monday. The same understanding will apply in relation to the tax bill. If debate is finished on Monday, and if there is a roll call on passage, and it is reasonable to assume there will be, so far as I am concerned we will postpone that roll call until Tuesday. I am sure the other Members of the House will not interfere with the carrying out of that understanding.

Mr. HALLECK. I may suggest one other thing. From my experience I am quite sure that general debate will run beyond Monday anyway.

Mr. McCORMACK. That it is reasonable to assume, but in the event general debate is terminated and there is a roll call on final passage of the bill, the understanding of the leadership on both sides is that the roll call will take place on Tuesday.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Assuming, and this is only an assumption, an improbable one, that some maverick makes a point of no quorum, will we adjourn forthwith? Will a motion to adjourn come up right away?

Mr. McCORMACK. A quorum call is not a roll call. There is a clear line of demarcation between a roll call and a quorum call.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I know there is.

Mr. McCORMACK. I know the gentleman does, and I have a lot of appreciation for the humor of my friend.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. If there is a point of order made on the vote, then that will go over?

Mr. McCORMACK. Where there is a main question involved, and on final vote, if there is not a quorum, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BONNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. Since he has agreed that the tax bill will be taken up on Monday, if debate is finished and there is a roll call, the roll call will go over until Tuesday. May I ask, if the tax bill is taken up on Tuesday, then will the roll call go over until Wednesday?

Mr. McCORMACK. Oh, no. I mean if the debate is not closed on Monday, and there is a continuation of debate on the tax bill on Tuesday, of course we will go ahead to final completion. This applies only to Monday.

Mr. BONNER. Does the gentleman intend to finish the tax bill on Tuesday?

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, I do not know what the length of time of debate will be. The understanding is that if the tax bill is concluded on Monday, that any roll call will go over until Tuesday. If debate is not concluded on Monday, then it will be continued on Tuesday, and we will go right ahead and conclude it.

Mr. BONNER. If you took the bill up on Tuesday, would you have the vote notwithstanding time for debate?

Mr. McCORMACK. If the bill cannot come up on Monday for any reason and it does come up on Tuesday, I would feel constrained to go ahead with the bill and conclude it without putting it over to another day for the roll call.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GRAHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. McGREGOR asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial appearing in the Mansfield News-Journal.

Mr. BOYKIN (at the request of Mr. RIVERS) was given permission to extend his remarks and include therewith an article on the distinguished new commander of the American Legion from Georgia, Hon. Erle Cocke, Jr.

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances and include some excerpts.

Mr. WELCH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. WAGNER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article and an editorial from the New York Post.

Mr. MANSFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter and a memorandum.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I received permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an article. I have a report from the printer today stating that the article covers four and one-quarter pages and will cost $348.50. I ask unanimous consent that my remarks may be extended in the Appendix of the RECORD to include this material, notwithstanding the additional cost.

The SPEAKER. Notwithstanding, and without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

RECESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for the Chair to declare a recess at any time today subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the House in recess at this time subject to the call of the Chair.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

SUPPLEMENTAL DEFENSE AND OTHER APPROPRIATIONS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 726)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and together with the accompanying papers referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am today transmitting to the Congress a request for additional funds to strengthen our defenses. The gravity of the world situation requires that these funds be made available with the utmost speed.

I am recommending additional appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year 1951 in the amount of 16.8 billion dollars. These funds are needed to support our part in the United Nations military action in Korea, and to increase the size and readiness of our Armed Forces should action become necessary in other parts of the world.

Together with the funds appropriated in the General Appropriation Act for fiscal year 1951, and those appropriated in the Supplemental Appropriation Act for fiscal 1951, this will make a total of 41.8 billion dollars for the United States military forces for the current fiscal year.

I am also recommending a supplemental appropriation for the Atomic Energy Commission in the amount of $1,050,000,000. These funds will enable the Commission to enlarge its production capacity substantially. The new facilities will provide larger capacity for the production of fissionable materials, and for the fabrication of such materials into atomic weapons. The fissionable materials thus produced can be utilized either in weapons or as fuels for power-producing atomic reactors. The program for building these additional facilities has been developed after thorough study over the last few months.

The further expansion of our military forces and of our atomic energy enterprise are directed toward strengthening the defenses of the United States and of the entire free world. This expansion is a matter of great urgency, which can be understood and evaluated only against the background of present critical world conditions.

United States troops are now fighting as part of the United Nations command in Korea. They are fighting for freedom and against tyranny—for law and order and against brutal aggression. The attack of the North Korean Communists on their peaceful fellow-countrymen in June was in defiance of the United Nations and was an attack upon the security of peacful nations everywhere. Their action, if unchecked, would have blasted all hope of a just and lasting peace—for if open aggression had been unopposed in Korea, it would have been an invitation to aggression elsewhere.

In that crisis, the United Nations acted, and the United States strongly supported that action—for the people of this country knew that our own freedom was as much at stake as the freedom of the Korean people. We knew that the issue was nothing less than the survival of freedom everywhere. If freemen did not stand together against aggression, there could be no hope for peace. This was essentially a moral decision. We did not hesitate, even though we knew we would have to operate at the end of lengthy supply lines, and would initially be faced with overwhelming odds.

There were serious reverses at first, but the courage and skill of our men, and those of other free nations, working together under brilliant leadership, drove the aggressors back.

It soon became evident that North Koreans alone could not have prepared the kind of well-organized, well-armed attack which was launched against the Republic of Korea. As Ambassador Austin proved in the Security Council of the United Nations, the aggressors were armed with Soviet Russian weapons. From the early days of the attack, it became clear that the North Korean forces were being supplemented and armed from across the frontier. Men and equipment were coming out of those dark places which lie behind the iron curtain.

As the United Nations forces continued to defeat the aggressors and continued to advance in their mission of liberation, Chinese Communist participation in the aggression became more blatant. General MacArthur, as commander of the United Nations forces, reported to the United Nations Security Council on November 5 the proof of this participation.

Despite this outside Communist aid, United Nations troops were well on the way to success in their mission of restoring peace and independence in Korea when the Chinese Communists a few days ago sent their troops into action on a large scale on the side of the aggressor.

The present aggression is thus revealed as a long-calculated move to defy the United Nations and to destroy the Republic of Korea which was giving a demonstration to the peoples of Asia of the advantages of life in an independent, national, non-Communist state.

The present attack on the United Nations forces by the Chinese Communists is a new act of aggression—equally as naked, deliberate, and unprovoked as the earlier aggression of the North Korean Communists. Cutting through the fog of Communist propaganda, this fact stands unmistakably clear: The Chinese Communists, without a shadow of justification, crossed the border of a neighboring country and attacked United Nations troops who were on a mission to restore peace under the direction of the organization representing mankind's best hope for freedom and justice.

The Chinese Communists have acted presumably with full knowledge of the dreadful consequences their action may bring on them. The Chinese people have been engaged in fighting within their own country for years, and in the process their lands and factories have been laid waste, and their young men killed. Nothing but further misery can come to the Chinese people from the reckless course of aggression into which they have been led by the Communists.

The United Nations resolutions, the statements of responsible officials in every free country, the actions of the United Nations command in Korea, all have proved beyond any possible misunderstanding that the United Nations action in Korea presented no threat to legitimate Chinese interests. The United States especially has a long history of friendship for the Chinese people and support for Chinese independence. There is no conceivable justification for the attack of the Chinese Communists upon the United Nations forces.

The only explanation is that these Chinese have been misled or forced into their reckless attack—an act which can only bring tragedy to themselves—to further the imperialist designs of the Soviet Union.

Nevertheless, the Chinese Communists have acted, and they must bear the responsibility for those acts. They have attacked a United Nations force composed of men from Australia, Canada, France, Korea, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, South Africa, Thailand, Turkey, the United Kingdom, and the United States. The United Nations force they have attacked includes also Indian and Swedish hospital units. It is a force now being supplemented by troops from Belgium, Colombia, Greece, and Luxemburg. Fifty-three members of the United Nations are supporting this common effort to stop aggression. The Chinese Communists struck at all of these countries when they started to make war against the United Nations.

The United Nations troops are defending themselves vigorously, and will do so with increasing effectiveness as their forces regroup. At Lake Success the United Nations is now considering how best to halt this new aggression and bring to an end the fighting in Korea.

Meanwhile, two facts are clear.

First, the moral issue now is the same as it was in June. The aggression of the Chinese Communists is a direct assault upon the United Nations and upon the principles of international law and order which are its foundation. By their action the Chinese Communist leaders have proved themselves lawbreakers in the community of nations. If there is to be any hope for world peace the nations which truly want peace must stand together in opposing this new aggression, just as they did in opposing the original attack from North Korea.

Second, this aggression casts a more ominous shadow over the prospects for world peace. We see no issue between the Chinese Communists and the free nations, or between the Soviet Union and the free nations, which could not be honorably solved by peaceful means. We continue to stand ready in good faith to seek solutions in that way. But the Chinese Communist leaders, who are known to be in close relations with the Kremlin, have not hesitated to make a large-scale assault upon United Nations troops. The leaders of Communist imperialism could not help but know that this action involved grave risk of world war. Their present aggressive actions seem utterly inconsistent with any peaceful intention.

In the face of this situation, the United States and the other free nations have no choice but to increase their military strength very rapidly. As free men, dedicated to the peaceful advancement of human well-being, we have not made this choice gladly. But we have made it firmly and definitely, and we will not falter or turn back.

Prior to this new act of aggression by the Chinese Communists, a supplemental estimate of appropriations for our Armed Forces was being prepared. This supplemental estimate, which I am transmitting to the Congress today, provides for large additional appropriations for the current fiscal year.

When the Communists of North Korea brutally assaulted the Republic of Korea last June, the strength of our armed forces stood at approximately 1,500,000 men and women; today, 5 months later, the manpower strength of our Armed Forces has been increased by more than 50 percent, to more than 2,250,000 men and women; and our goal, until this most recent act of aggression, has been a strength of 2,800,000 by the end of the current fiscal year. Now we face the necessity of having to raise our sights, both in terms of manpower and in terms of production.

This prospect makes it essential that the funds I am now requesting be made available speedily in order to build up our military strength as rapidly as possible. About $9,000,000,000 of these new funds will be used for major military procurement, and to expand facilities for military production.

The appropriation request I am transmitting today is not a war budget. That would obviously require far more money.

However, the immediate appropriation of these funds will permit us to make the fastest possible progress in increasing our strength. This action will permit us to go ahead at once to step up rapidly the size of the Armed Forces and the rate of military training. It will permit us to go ahead at once to increase rapidly the rate of production of planes, tanks and other military equipment. At the same time, we can be going ahead with plans for such further expansion as may be necessary, and any additional funds required for that purpose can be requested when and as such plans are worked out.

These measures will put us in a position to move speedily into an increased state of mobilization if the situation grows worse. If the situation improves, we can level off the size of forces and the rate of production of military goods as may be appropriate. In any case, we must be prepared to endure a long period of tension.

I wish to emphasize again, as I have before, that the situation we are in requires from every one of us the utmost devotion and willingness to do his part. In this critical time, the national interest is paramount, and all partisan or selfish considerations must be subordinated.

The United States is today strong and free. Whatever may come, I know the people of this country will do everything in their power to increase that strength and protect our precious freedom.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 1, 1950.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

By Mr. PATTERSON:

H. R. 9839. A bill for the relief of Julio Henrique Da Silva; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

MONDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, by whom the meek are guided in judgment and light riseth up in darkness for the godly, grant us in all doubts and uncertainties the grace to ask what Thou wouldst have us to do, that the spirit of wisdom may save us from all false choices and that in Thy light we may see light and in Thy straight path may not stumble.

Bowing in this storied Chamber we are conscious that we are heirs of great traditions. We are conscious, too, of a listening world, hoping in its agony that the horror of global war may be averted. In this mad and sad day filled with the angry accents of hate, we humbly bow at the beginning of this fateful week with the deathless assurance that can turn even seeming tragedy to triumph: "The eternal God is our refuge and underneath are the everlasting arms." We ask it in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 1, 1950, was dispensed with.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

On request of Mr. WHERRY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. TOBEY was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate until Thursday on official business of the Committee on Small Business.

On request of Mr. WHERRY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. CARLSON was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate Wednesday and Thursday to attend the annual meeting of the Council of State Governments, of which he is the chairman.

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MCCARRAN was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate for an indefinite period.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Foreign Relations was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

SENATOR FROM CALIFORNIA

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram from the Governor of California, the Honorable Earl Warren, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CALIF., December 3, 1950.

SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.:

This is to advise you that on December 1, 1950, I appointed RICHARD M. NIXON United States Senator to fill the unexpired term of United States Senator Sheridan Downey in the Eighty-first Congress. On that same date, I mailed Senator NIXON'S commission to him at Washington, D. C.

EARL WARREN,
Governor.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, the Senator-elect is present in the Chamber, and I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to take the oath of office.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? The Chair hears none. If the Senator-elect will come forward, the Chair will administer the oath of office to him.

Mr. NIXON, escorted by Mr. KNOWLAND, advanced to the desk, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him by the Vice President.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hoey	Mundt

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

RENEWAL OF PROGRAM OF VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION FOR DISABLED VETERANS (H. DOC. NO. 728)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has a communication from the President of the United States, which is really meant for the Senate. The clerk will read the communication.

The Chief Clerk read the communication, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 4, 1950.

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
Vice President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I wish to recommend action in the present session to renew the program of vocational rehabilitation for disabled veterans, which was in effect during and after World War II. Since the Armed Forces are now beginning to discharge men disabled in the current hostilities, renewal of these benefits has become a matter of urgency, warranting action before the present Congress adjourns.

During the last war, as at the present time, the first men to be released by the Armed Forces were those who had been wounded or otherwise disabled and were no longer able to serve on active duty. These men were—and are—entitled under permanent law to full medical treatment and to monthly compensation varying with the degree of disability. In addition, disabled veterans of World War II were given help by the Government in gaining the qualifications needed for civilian employment. In some cases, this meant completion of professional training interrupted by the war. In other cases, old skills had to be brushed up, or new skills acquired.

This program was authorized by Public Law 16 of the Seventy-eighth Congress. Under this law, every disabled veteran who needed vocational rehabilitation in overcoming the handicap of his disability, was enabled to undertake any type of education or training for which he had aptitude and interest. The colleges and universities and the trade and vocational schools all cooperated in the program, and many special courses were established. Arrangements were also made in many cases for training on the farm and on the job.

While the disabled veterans were in training, their tuition was paid by the Government, and the Government financed their subsistence and school supplies.

In this way, thousands of disabled veterans were reequipped for jobs in civil life. In a great many cases, these men were able fully to overcome the loss of earning power which had resulted from their disability. In all, more than 550,000 disabled veterans have participated in the rehabilitation program authorized by Public Law 16.

However, the benefits of Public Law 16 are not available to men who began their military service after July 25, 1947. This means that most of the men disabled during the current campaign in Korea will not receive the kind of rehabilitation benefits which were extended to the disabled veterans of the last war unless new legislation is enacted. I hope that such legislation will receive favorable action by the Congress before the close of this session.

Disabled veterans will need rehabilitation assistance first of all. Later they may also need other kinds of help in readjusting to civilian status. The next Congress will have an opportunity to give full consideration to their longer range needs and to those of the able-bodied men, now in service, who will eventually be returned to civil life. In planning to meet these needs it will, of course, be essential to relate any new benefits to the readjustment problems which will actually face our future veterans. It will be necessary to review with care the experience gained in the veterans' readjustment programs after World War II. This will take time.

Meanwhile, however, there is no reason for delay in meeting the immediate needs of the disabled servicemen who are now being released by the Armed Forces.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

FEDERAL CIVIL-DEFENSE PROGRAM—REFERENCE OF BILLS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has at the desk, for reference, two bills which were introduced last week, Senate bill 4217, introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], and Senate bill 4219, introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], to authorize a Federal civil-defense program. In view of the importance of this proposed legislation, the Chair does not feel justified in holding up the reference of the bills any longer.

The Chair has investigated the rule governing the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services and jurisdiction of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, in view of the suggestion that the bills be referred to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. The Reorganization Act undertook to delineate the jurisdiction of committees more in detail and more definitely than had ever been done before.

The present occupant of the Chair has tried to preserve the integrity of the committees as outlined in the rule. The act creating the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy provides that it shall have jurisdiction to investigate activities of the Atomic Energy Commission and to investigate the development, use, and control of atomic energy. Obviously that means the development, use, and control of atomic energy in this country—our own atomic energy. It could not be held to include the investigation of the development, use, and control of atomic energy in other countries, so far as proposed legislation before the Senate is concerned, although no doubt the joint committee would have jurisdiction to look into the development everywhere.

The rule providing for the jurisdiction of the Armed Services Committee provides that, among other things, it shall have jurisdiction over defense matters generally in the United States. Atomic energy and the use of the atomic bomb constitute only one phase of attacks which might be made upon the United States. The bill itself provides other methods by which an attack might take place; namely, sabotage, artillery bombardments, any form of attack which might endanger the safety of this country. That goes far beyond the jurisdiction of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

For that reason the Chair feels compelled to refer both these bills to the Committee on Armed Services.

In view of the importance of the matter, the Chair hopes that very prompt consideration will be given to the proposed legislation.

The bills were taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Armed Services, as follows:

S. 4217. A bill to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes; and

S. 4219. A bill to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCMAHON obtained the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. MCMAHON. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Is the distinguished Vice President now speaking of Senate bill 4217?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; both Senate bill 4217 and Senate bill 4219.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Chair very much.

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. President, I agree with the distinguished occupant of the Chair as to the importance of this proposed legislation and as to the necessity to have the Senate, through its authorized committees, begin consideration of it. Perhaps it would not be amiss if I were to take a moment to describe the activities of the joint committee in this field.

When it became apparent, a year ago last September, that the Soviets had exploded an atomic bomb, the implications of that were not lost upon those of us who were most intimately concerned with the subject. As chairman of the joint committee, and after consultation with the other members of the committee, I determined upon a series of hearings on the subject of civilian defense. Those hearings were commenced last winter. We held 10 or 12 sessions, and compiled what I think is a very valuable record, which was of considerable assistance to those in the executive branch who had the responsibility of going forward with the program. I believe the work which was done then has borne good fruit.

Until a few minutes ago, I did not know of the intention of the Vice President to refer the bills to the Armed Services Committee. Before that, I had scheduled, as one of the series of hearings which were being held, a meeting this afternoon with Mr. Symington and his advisers. We shall go forward with that meeting, and, of course, I extend an invitation to the members of the Armed Services Committee to come to that meeting and to participate in it.

When the Reorganization Act was written, I do not suppose it was contemplated that we would face a situation such as the one we face today. I should like to point out that the armed services, which are within the jurisdiction of the Armed Services Committee, have specifically said on a number of occasions that the responsibility for civilian defense does not rest in the Pentagon. I believe very firmly that it is highly necessary that our civilian defenses remain in the hands of civilians.

Despite all that, Mr. President, because of the seriousness of this situation it is not my personal judgment that over a point of jurisdiction of committees there should be delay in connection with the consideration of this matter. I have been talking with one of the members of a subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee which has been appointed to consider this matter, namely, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], to see whether we could work out a situation which would comport with the best interests of our security, because that is all I am interested in at this time. I shall continue those conferences in conjunction with the other members of the joint committee, particularly those who also are members of the Armed Services Committee, to see whether we can sensibly work out this matter. There is a big job to be done. It must be attacked with speed and with wisdom.

Again I say I shall see what I can do about working it out, without in any way surrendering sensible claims to a sensible participation in the matter.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred, as indicated:

LAW ENACTED BY CONGRESS OF GUAM

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a copy of a law enacted by the Tenth Congress of Guam (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

LAW ENACTED BY LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF VIRGIN ISLANDS

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a copy of a law enacted by the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the Virgin Islands, first session 1950 (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

REPORT OF MIGRATORY BIRD CONSERVATION COMMISSION

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, as Chairman of the Migratory Bird Conservation Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A petition of Mary N. Powers and sundry citizens of Chicago, Ill., praying for the use of the A-bomb in Russia; to the Committee on Armed Services.

A letter in the nature of a petition from the Liberal Party of New York State, New York., N. Y., signed by Marx Lewis, chairman, national legislative committee, and Ben Davidson, executive director, praying for the speedy enactment of legislation providing excess-profits taxes, etc.; to the Committee on Finance.

A resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Minneapolis, Minn., relating to a tax on excess profits of regulated public utilities; to the Committee on Finance.

A paper in the nature of a petition from Manila Post, No. 464, Department of California, the American Legion, relating to the benefits bestowed upon Filipino veterans; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

A resolution adopted by the one hundred and forty-third convention of the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs, New York, N. Y., favoring the enactment of legislation granting statehood to Hawaii and Alaska; ordered to lie on the table.

A telegram in the nature of a petition from the Bar Association of Hawaii, signed by C. Nils Tavares, president, Honolulu, T. H., praying for the enactment of legislation granting statehood to Hawaii and Alaska; ordered to lie on the table.

RESOLUTIONS OF WISCONSIN ORGANIZATIONS ENDORSING FEDERAL ECONOMY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, like other Members of the Senate, I have recently received many expressions from the people of my State urging an all-out effort for Federal economy. The people of the "grass roots" recognize that with America heavily involved in the Korean conflict we must indeed economize on the home front in all nonessential spending.

As an indication of that opinion among our people, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD, at this point, the text of two resolutions which I have received this very morning; one of them is from Eli Gebhard, secretary of the Slinger, Wis., Advancement Association. The other is from Miss Julia Ramsay, secretary of the Homestead Grange, No. 684, Peshtigo, Wis.

I congratulate these two fine organizations on their sound thinking.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Department, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SLINGER ADVANCEMENT ASSOCIATION,
Slinger, Wis., November 28, 1950.

United States Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Chippewa Falls, Wis.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: The Slinger Advancement Association earnestly hopes that you will support all nonmilitary appropriation cuts made by the United States Budget Bureau. While some of the announced cuts may seem large, we know that they are based on intimate knowledge and study, by the Budget Bureau of the program and activities of each department.

We know that from your past record you have always favored economy in Federal spending, without impairing national defense, and we wish to offer our moral support to you in this cause.

Very truly yours,

ELI GEBHARD,
Secretary.

PESHTIGO, WIS., November 28, 1950.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: At the last regular meeting of Homestead Grange, No. 684, the following resolution was adopted by them:

Realizing that the Federal Government must have increased revenue with which to pay the cost of the defense program and that Congress is at present confronted with the problem of devising means of raising this revenue, Homestead Grange, No. 684, is asking Congress to use every effort to reduce nondefense spending before new taxes are added.

It further urges that the Federal payroll be reduced as a means of reducing Government expense.

We solicit your cooperation in the above resolution.

Fraternally and sincerely,

JULIA RAMSAY,
Secretary, Homestead Grange, No. 684.

LET US REMEMBER WHO THE CULPRIT IS—EDITORIAL FROM THE DES MOINES REGISTER

[Mr. GILLETTE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Let Us Remember Who the Culprit Is," published in the Des Moines Register of Thursday, November 30, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION BOARD

[Mr. MAGNUSON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a list of the Presidential appointees to the National Science Foundation Board and a résumé of their biographies, which appear in the Appendix.]

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND FISHERIES—ARTICLE BY EDWARD W. ALLEN

[Mr. MAGNUSON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "International Law and Fisheries," written by Mr. Edward W. Allen, which appears in the Appendix.]

NATIONAL EDUCATION PROGRAM FOR STUDY OF CONGRESS—CORRESPONDENCE WITH YOUR CONGRESS MAGAZINE

[Mr. KEFAUVER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD correspondence with Hal J. Miller, editor of Your Congress magazine, relative to a national education program for a study of Congress, which appears in the Appendix.]

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. MAYBANK, from the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Alan Valentine, of New York, to be Economic Stabilization Administrator.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, when the Senate convened 1 week ago today, we had before us Calendar No. 2263, the bill (S. 3295) to amend the Railway Labor Act and to authorize agreements providing for union membership and agreements for deductions from the wages of carrier's employees for certain purposes and under certain conditions. On that day the Senator from Illinois entered a motion to proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 1932, the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union. The motion to take up House bill 331 was debated all week long.

There is now before the Senate an important measure, known as Calendar Order 2587, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill (H. R. 331) is the subject of a motion to proceed to its consideration, which motion is pending. The bill is not yet before the Senate. Does the Senator from Illinois ask that the motion be laid aside temporarily?

Mr. LUCAS. I ask unanimous consent that my motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 331) be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. STENNIS. I object. I am opposed to passage of the Alaska statehood bill, but I am not opposed to bringing up for consideration the joint resolution to extend rent control, or anything of the kind. The Senator from Illinois has another remedy, if he desires to have the joint resolution considered. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi objects.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in view of the objection by the Senator from Mississippi, which I regret exceedingly, I now withdraw the motion I made a week ago today to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 331) to provide for the admission of Alaska into the Union.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois withdraws the motion.

Mr. LUCAS. I now ask unanimous consent that, without prejudicing the rights of the unfinished business, namely, the bill (S. 3295) to amend the Railway Labor Act and to authorize agreements providing for union membership and agreements for deductions from the wages of carrier's employees for certain purposes and under certain conditions, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I should like to have cleared up the mechanics of this procedure, so that all Senators may understand it. If I understand the majority leader correctly, he is now asking unanimous consent that the unfinished business, which is a bill to amend the Railway Labor Act, be laid aside temporarily. Is that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. I am asking unanimous consent that the bill to amend the Railway Labor Act be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGER. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota objects.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. WHERRY. The question I desire to ask the distinguished Vice President is this: Now that a motion has been agreed to to proceed to the consideration of the rent-control legislation, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) is now the unfinished business of the Senate, and the bill to amend the Railway Labor Act is returned to the calendar. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rent-control measure displaces the Railway Labor Act, which is returned to the calendar.

THE WORLD CRISIS

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senate heard read a message from the President of the United States having to do with a recommendation of legislation to provide for the rehabilitation of disabled American veterans. In my opinion it was a very laudable message. There is no question in my mind that disabled American veterans should be rehabilitated if at all possible, and I am for the proposition to rehabilitate them. But, more serious than that, is the question, What is the country going to do, and what is the Congress of the United States going to do about having many thousands of other American veterans in the future who may need rehabilitation? Is it at all possible to prevent such conditions coming about that they will have to be rehabilitated?

Irrespective of feelings of persons whether in Government or otherwise, it is absolutely necessary that the American people and our Government get realistic about the world situation as it is today. Intentions can be of the best. Public and military officials can act in the best of faith, but we do know that the situation in Korea is grave and serious. The casualties among the American troops and a few of our friends of the United Nations are high and still mounting. All the average American citizen needs to do is to open any newspaper, whether it be a country weekly published in one of the rural districts of the Nation, or a daily newspaper published in a great metropolis, to see how the casualties are mounting. The situation is so grave that officials of the existing Governments of England and France are here for consultation.

I took an oath of office when I was sworn in as United States Senator. I have tried in conscience to carry out that oath of office. I have never been more sincere in anything that I have said than in what I am going to tell the Members of the Senate now.

This country, the executive department, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, must once and forever tell the world that we will not recognize Communist China. Let us tell the world now—and the world might as well understand it—that, irrespective of the outcome in Korea, even if Korea turns out to be another Dunkerque, we must let the world know that we will be back there and anywhere else in the world if necessary to protect the ideals for which free people stand.

Soviet Russia is trying to exploit what she feels to be our weakness in manpower. She feels that because China has hordes of manpower and because other areas in different parts of the world have hordes of manpower, she can overwhelm us by the use of that manpower. Russia forgets, and is badly mistaken, because the manpower of the United States includes all of the free thinking people of the world, and that includes millions in China.

Russia, through deceit and by false promises and hopes, is seeking to set the free-thinking people of the world against each other. She started with Korea and now has China involved—Communist China. A Communist is a Communist no matter where he is or what he is. He is a Communist whether he is a Russian, a Chinese, an American, or a Frenchman. He is still a Communist. The Communists believe in dictatorship and dictatorial power and not in the basic freedoms of the people. They are opposed to the principles of freedom and democracy, which are represented by our country and which have resulted in the greatest industrial productivity and highest living standards that have ever existed in the world.

To students of history it is well known that those nations which have permitted basic freedoms have enjoyed the highest standards of living. Those basic freedoms are those of religion, of speech, and of action, so long as the action of a citizen does not interfere with the freedom of his neighbor. That has been known for thousands of years by the peoples of the world. We in this country know what it means. We fought the mother country. We fought ourselves, and we fought in two world wars to establish those freedoms. Now it looks as though we shall have to have another war to maintain it. Freedom has been bought by the blood of the sons of many nations in many areas of the world. Even the Redeemer had to die in order to redeem the world. People throughout the world have paid with blood, suffering death, and deprivation, but those freedoms were worth the price.

I am confident that the world would like to share with us these ideals of freedom. They would like to share with us these ideals and to enjoy freedom of religion, of speech, and of movement. They would like to worship God according to their conscience, they would like to express opinions freely, and they would like to move about as they please so long as they do not interfere with the rights of others.

Mr. President, what has been the result of the efforts of the United Nations up to now? We have had the moral support of the non-Communist world. We have had the political support of the majority of the United Nations. However, in the showdown, when facing stern realities, and when the shooting war started in Korea, the great majority of the dying, the wounded, and those who suffered were Americans. The ones who will be subject to the legislation recommended by the President of the United States are American boys. Therefore, in my opinion, the hour calls for action, not appeasement. The United Nations may not be prepared to join us in an effective way to fight against communism for those freedoms in order to save civilization. Members of the Senate, that is exactly what it means. The hour has arrived to take some action in order to save civilization.

Consequently, in my opinion we must go to the people of other freedom-loving nations—through their governments, but we must go to them—and raise a world army to fight for their and our freedoms. This is not an idle dream. It is not impracticable. We must raise a world army of at least 20,000,000. We must raise an army of men who believe as we do and who are ready to make all sacrifices necessary. Such an army can be recruited, trained, and equipped, as we have raised, trained, and equipped our own troops, if only we are practical enough and use a little American common sense.

Why do I say that? Even when hostilities broke out in Korea our consulates all over the world were swamped by citizens and subjects of nations who wanted to enlist in the fight against communism along with American boys. They did not have an opportunity to do so. They wanted to fight, but international politics, maneuvering for political position, maneuvering for a little commercial advantage, made it necessary that those who would fight and die and suffer along with American boys be denied that privilege. It can be done if we approach the problem with a little American common sense. It can be done if we face the stern realities with a little American common sense. This is war. If any Senator does not believe it, I ask that he pick up a country weekly paper from his State. I get the papers from my State. No one can tell a mother in Los Chavez, N. Mex., where I was born, that her son Garcia, who was killed in Korea, was not fighting in a war. This is no time for appeasement. Our strength lies in our productivity, in our ideals, and in our concept of what we stand for. It means everything that makes it possible for us to stand here today and express an opinion. Let us put our strength to work.

I propose that this Nation, through proper authorities, enlist the manpower of the free-thinking world by a new method of approach and, instead of spending billions and billons of dollars through ECA or the Marshall plan, that we recruit millions of men throughout the world, train them and pay them as we do our American soldiers, and we may rest assured that they will fight for the same ideals American boys are now dying for.

Oh, yes, the United Nations may pass resolutions stating they are for us, but they still do not send any troops, except for a few British, Turks, and Filipinos. Aside from those troops, what have we? They pass resolutions calling on Arabia and Israel to stop shooting. What we want to do is to stop the Communists from shooting. That is our first duty, as I see it. The approach, in my opinion, should be that, instead of spending billions and billions through ECA and the Marshall plan, we recruit these millions of men throughout the world, as I have said.

History teaches us, even at the moment, that foreign recruits are fighting for other nations where war is going on. France has them. England has them in outposts. So why cannot we have freedom-loving people helping us and helping themselves. Russia has them in Communist China. Why cannot we do something that makes sense?

We have tried to get the United Nations to support us with military manpower without success. What I propose is simply to recruit a foreign legion, which we would train, equip, and maintain, and to make this force available along with our own troops to fight for freedom.

What the President of the United States and the Secretary of State should fully apprise the world of is that we will not recognize communistic China or communistic Korea, and that we do not intend to let communistic Russia bluff us in any way, shape, or form. Furthermore, that it is our purpose to go to the free-thinking people of the world to recruit the military manpower necessary to stop the communistic world. Those two points should be emphasized to the representatives of weakening members of the United Nations.

I do not say this in any criticism of the Secretary of State, and this is not a question of personalities; but situations come and go. The flag means more to me, the Constitution means more to me, the Declaration of Independence means more to me, and the American system means more to me, than any personality, including the Senator from New Mexico. Law must prevail. The country must go on. If it is necessary that a particular person suffer, Mr. President, what has that to do compared with the saving of America?

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

COLLUSION TO LOSE CHINA

Mr. MALONE. I should like to ask the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico if the evidence at this time pointing toward our intent in losing Asia is not cumulative. It began, of course, when the British deliberately recognized Communist China without consulting our people, and was followed by the statement of the Secretary of State that we would not use the veto to prevent such recognition after his return from the conference in Europe last summer.

Now we have the continued encouragement of our Secretary of State, working with England and other European nations to secure recognition of Communist China.

Is not the evidence cumulative that what we intend to do is to round up the votes for the speedy recognition of Communist China by the United Nations, the United States voting against it but not using the veto, and then abandoning Formosa to its fate, and flooding the country with propaganda to the effect that we may as well recognize Communist China, after the United Nations has recognized it? Have we not been taking one step at a time for the past 18 months toward the recognition of Communist China?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I desire to answer the Senator from Nevada in good faith. I do not want to become involved in an argument, or to indulge in personalities.

I do not know whether anything that happened 6 months ago, a year ago, or 2 years ago, or the other day, proves anything whatsoever. All I do know, and all I am trying to impress upon the Senate, is that some action should be taken. I do not know what the Secretary of State had in mind 6 months ago. I shall take it for granted, until I know differently, that he was acting in good faith. But the point is not whether he was right or wrong. The point I am trying to make is that action should be taken now. We are not fighting a war we were fighting 6 months ago. We are fighting a war on the 4th of December 1950 and that is the one I should like to meet. We must be prepared also for what may come in the future.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from New Mexico upon his statement—and fully agree with him—that we should make our position clear. As a matter of fact, the junior Senator from Nevada has been saying for 4 years that we must determine which areas in the world are important to our ultimate safety, and make known that we will defend those areas, and not recognize Communist China or Communist anything.

But the distinguished Senator from New Mexico will remember that the Secretary of State said last July that we would not use the veto to prevent admission of Red China to the United Nations.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Suppose he did. That does not prove that he was acting in bad faith, so far as I am concerned, because, the Lord knows, we want peace. The people of the United States do not want to fight. The people of the United States do not want to have their boys slaughtered in Korea or elsewhere. The people of the United States are willing to do almost anything in order to prevent war. But we have now reached the point where we are fighting, and our boys are being killed. We should do something about it, to try to save as many as we possibly can.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. Let me say again that I fully agree with the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. We must make our position clear—let it be known what we mean to do and why we are doing it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not want to do it piecemeal.

Mr. MALONE. We cannot hold General MacArthur on any line, as we did on the thirty-eighth parallel for 10 days while the Communists regrouped their forces, and then hold him on the boundary of Manchuria and prevent him from attacking their bases, and win a war.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wish my good friend from Nevada would strictly understand me. So far as I am concerned, MacArthur is incidental. Acheson is incidental. The military are incidental. I respect them all; but America does mean something to me.

Mr. MALONE. I should like to say further to my distinguished colleague that I fully agree that we must establish a foreign policy—understood by foreign nations and our own people alike and get ready to defend it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not want any politics involved in this discussion.

Mr. MALONE. I understand. I fully agree with the distinguished Senator from New Mexico. However, it seems to me that it is plain to be seen that Atlee's visit means that there will be a proposal placed before us to stop that war by recognizing Communist China and pulling out of Formosa. I believe that such a proposal will be made very soon—and I believe it will result in one more step toward Communist domination of the world.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am suggesting that we do not stand for that.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GILLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. Does the Senator think we should clamp a blockade on the China coast and seal her ports?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I think we should go to the extent of everything necessary to stop communistic China and communistic Russia. Does that answer the Senator's question? As to the method of doing that, the Senator might suggest one way, I might suggest another. I am thinking only of what may be necessary.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is the Senator in favor of cooperating with Chiang Kai-shek, and sending his forces back to the mainland?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am in favor of cooperating with millions of Chinese; yes. We can use Chiang Kai-shek. The Senator from Mississippi is not going to place me on the spot in that respect.

Mr. EASTLAND. I am not trying to place the Senator on the spot.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I have as much respect for Chiang Kai-shek as I have for the Communists. I know that there are millions of Chinese who do not feel as does Chiang Kai-shek who have always been our friends. Why not try to do something with them?

Mr. EASTLAND. Does not the Senator think we should arm the anti-Communists in China?

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is exactly what I am suggesting, and in the not far distant future, within the next few days, I am going to indicate how they could be armed, not for fighting for the philosophy of Chiang Kai-shek, or the philosophy of Communist China, but in order to carry out our ideals and concepts of a free people.

Mr. President, what I am saying is not said with the idea of criticism of the motives of the Secretary of State, his sincerity of purpose, or his integrity. I may be mistaken, but I think that his trouble is that he is trying to make up his mind from the thinking of the central part of the North Atlantic States, and it does not involve the thinking of Bolivar or Clinton Corners, N. Y., Eaton, Ky., or Sullivan Hollow, Miss., or Los Chavez, in New Mexico, or Fort Scott, Nebr. I do not think he knows the pulse of the American people as it exists where the heart of America is, Jefferson City, Mo., or Lamont, or anywhere else. If he would get the concept of what is going on at Metropolis, Ill., or Ventura, Calif., or Golden, Colo., he would find that the American people now, irrespective of how much they desire and pray for peace, do not want appeasement of communistic China, no matter who recommends it.

It is my purpose to tell the Senate in the near future what the Senator from Mississippi has suggested, as to how we can get the millions of Chinese who are willing to be our friends to fight, not only against communistic China, which is the main purpose at the moment, but to fight against anything that fails to uphold the freedom we talk about and brag about and try to secure.

I thank the Senate.

NECESSITY FOR COMBATING AGGRESSIVE COMMUNISM IN ASIA

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, this is no mere "police action" going on in Korea. American fighting men have never been called upon to face more difficult terrain and weather conditions or to confront a more fanatical foe than those against whom our forces are now engaged.

All of Asia hangs in the balance. If the manpower and the natural resources of Asia fall into the orbit of international communism there will exist the greatest aggregation of power the world has ever known. With its Asiatic flank fully protected, the Soviet Union will be able to concentrate its strong far eastern armed forces with those it now has in eastern Europe and greatly offset any new planned build-up in armed forces of the Western World. Therein rests the fallacy of those who would abandon Asia and concentrate on Europe alone.

Nine years ago this week we were caught with our defenses down at Pearl Harbor. A heavy blow which precipitated us into World War II came out of the Pacific, and the invasion by an Asiatic foe of some of the Alaskan Aleutian Islands took place soon after. This was done by a nation of 80,000,000 people. A billion and a half is the population of Asia, a large part of which today is either still outside the iron curtain or not yet fully digested.

The week beginning today may determine which way the free people of Asia turn. There are millions of Asiatics who want to be free and who are willing to fight to help preserve a free world of free men. They need and they want some leadership.

Today I speak on my responsibility as a Senator of the United States. I speak as a Republican who followed the leadership of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] in trying to develop an American foreign policy that would have some continuity regardless of which one of our great political parties was in control of the executive branch of the Government. My record is to be found in the proceedings of the Seventy-ninth Congress, subsequent to my coming to the Senate on August 14, 1945, the Eightieth, and Eighty-first. I have supported the United Nations legislation, the ECA, the North Atlantic Pact, the arms-implementation legislation, and the Greek-Turkish aid program.

However, I have believed that aggressive communism was global in character and that it did not make sense to close the door in Europe if the door in Asia was to be left wide open. It was at this point that I have differed with the policies of this administration.

The Congress has a constitutional obligation which must not be abdicated. It will not serve the best interests of the security of our Nation or of the free world for the Congress to allow itself to become a rubber stamp for this or any future administration.

We have a right and an obligation to ask some questions and to get some frank answers now from our own executive branch and from those who are now here to advise with and try to influence our executive in the formulation of policy or the change in policy.

We boldly, with great risk, broke the Berlin blockade by air and permitted the two and one-quarter million free people of Berlin to survive when to have taken counsel of despair would have placed them all under the totalitarian rule of the Soviet Union.

We boldly, with great risk, supported the Government of 7,500,000 people of Greece in order to prevent the Greek Communists from taking over that area and those people.

But are we now to take the position that human freedom is less worth supporting in Asia than it is in Europe? Our action to date in Korea clearly says no to any such doctrine. Yet to follow the advice of some of the "concentrate on Europe" clique that is what the end result would be. If the free people of China on Formosa are sacrificed where do you draw the line? Cannot the same argument apply to Korea? To Japan? To the Philippines? To Indonesia? To Indochina? To Burma? To Siam? To Pakistan? And to India? Where do you draw the line? If we now serve notice on our friends and potential enemies that we dare not protect our far eastern door because we have to concentrate on Europe why should not militant communism take that as a green light to complete the conquest of this vast area in the shortest possible time so that when his stockpile of atomic weapons is larger in 1952 or 1953 he will have already gained control of the vast population and strategic reserves of Asia? Certainly no prudent subject of the British crown would expect to arouse the moral indignation of the world against aggression in Hong Kong, Singapore or the Malay States if all the noncolonial Asiatic nations had been thrown to the wolves of communism in this now far eastern Munich which is in the making.

The United Nations might have been and still might be something that free men in Asia, Europe and here might tie to in this desperate hour of world's history.

But this week it is not alone Communist China and the Soviet Union which are on trial at the bar of world public opinion, but the United Nations itself is on trial.

On the 26th of June of this year and the days immediately following free men everywhere were electrified that at last there was a system of collective security that could function to resist aggression. Fifty-three of the then 59 members of the United Nations—all but the Soviet Union and its satellites—recognized the movements of North Korean Communists across the thirty-eighth parallel as aggression.

Now we come to the week of December 4, less than 6 months later, with members vacillating and palavering over whether or not the movement of over 400,000,000 Chinese Communists across the international frontier of the Yalu River is aggression and whether it should be treated as such.

Are we to have one rule and set of penalties for small nation aggressors and none at all for the large? Are we to continue our moral and material support to an organization which kow-tows to the doctrine that might makes right?

Or is the new United Nations doctrine to be not one of international law and order which both the weak and the strong must respect or face the collective opposition of all the law-abiding nations of the world, but rather a loose system where each individual member will determine whether the killing of his neighbor and the raping of his neighbor's wife was or was not of quite sufficient importance to warrant the effort to round up the outlaw? Do our European friends think that there is any real security for them in such a system? Any such precedent established in Asia will rise to plague the European community.

Is the spirit of Munich once again filling the chancelries of Europe? Is it now approved doctrine that small nations can be sacrificed to expediency or does this doctrine apply only to the Asiatic area? If so, is it the color of a man's skin or his geographic location that determines his right to live in a free world of free men?

Colonialism in Asia is dead though there are some walking Zombies who do not yet understand that basic fact. Nor will kow-towing to or appeasing communism prolong their manifestations of life beyond the time it serves the purposes of Mao Tse-tung to permit such goings-on to continue.

The people of Asia are determined that they shall develop their own national aspirations. The Achilles heel of international communism, I believe, is that no Communist state tied to international communism can be free or independent. We have not yet done the job needed to be done to make that clear to the people both outside and inside the iron curtain.

But while they struggle for freedom and with the complexities of new constitutional governments we must be ready both to extend supervised military and economic aid and have an understanding of their problems and their errors. We must not forget that we have had the benefit of the experience of 174 years of self-government since we broke our own colonial ties and we have had a longer heritage going back to Magna Carta. Many of these new Asiatic republics are having to learn the hard way that freedom is not something that once gained can be taken for granted.

The free people of the Far East are realistic. They know, even if India and its leader Nehru do not, that militant communism cannot be stopped with passive resistance. The non-Communist people of Japan, the Republic of Korea, the Republic of China, or the Republic of the Philippines are not willing to risk their lives and their nations' freedom on the type of leadership India is presently offering. They know that India has not offered a single soldier, sailor, or airman to help stop aggression in Korea. They know that India has either abstained or voted with the Soviet Union many more times than she has voted with the free world. They are not favorably impressed with that record. Yet, there are still those in Washington who would have us tie our far eastern policy to the tail of India's kite.

The leadership cannot come from Great Britain because she is compromised by both her colonial policy in Asia, past and present, as well as by her recognition of the Chinese Communist regime.

Leadership could be furnished by the United States which, despite Soviet and Communist propaganda, still has a great reservoir of good will throughout the Far East.

In China the open-door policy of John Hay and our diplomatic support of a free China; our education of Chinese students with the Boxer indemnity funds; the work of our missionaries and educators, are too well known to be destroyed overnight by either Soviet or Chinese efforts. However, give the Communists 10 or 15 years to spread the same lies that Malik and his associates have spread at the United Nations and that reservoir of good will will be almost drained dry.

In Japan the success of the occupation under General MacArthur and the economic, political, and spiritual developments which have taken place has built such good will that despite the fact that that nation has been largely stripped of its occupation forces there has not been a single case of sabotage or obstruction, but to the contrary, the fullest cooperation.

Citizens of the Philippines, both members of the Government and of the opposition parties, know that the United States carried out its promises of freedom. They know that nowhere in the history of Russia under either the Tsars or the Commissars has there been anything comparable to this. To the contrary, Soviet imperialism has absorbed the independent nations of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, and by unilateral action has taken a large piece of Poland, and is fastening an iron grip upon Mongolia and Manchuria. In addition Red China, like the satellites of eastern Europe, is closely tied by doctrine and by treaty to the Kremlin.

However, these free and noncommunist people will find it difficult to cooperate with us toward maintaining a free world of free men if they do not know what our policy in the Far East is to be.

A vast majority of them are convinced, I believe, that the road to appeasement is not the road to peace and that appeasement, as at Munich, is but surrender on the installment plan.

Is there Chinese Communist aggression in Korea today? Does a single Senator in this Chamber doubt it? Does a single delegate from the noncommunist world to the United Nations doubt it. I think not.

Is aggression any less dangerous to peace because it has been committed by a larger power? Of course not. Is aggression only down to a line fixed by the unilateral action of the aggressor something which entitles him to a pardon? On this basis wherein does any security exist for Berlin or for the border states of Iran or Turkey? What is the test of aggression to be? If the aggressor succeeds, is he to be considered a hero entitled to membership in the lodge, but if he fails, only then is he to be an outcast among the law-abiding nations?

I hope Prime Minister Attlee and Premier Pleven, with whom he has been in consultation prior to his trip here, will frankly answer all these questions that have been raised today. I hope President Truman will also.

If the free world will not stand up and be counted in this clear-cut case of aggression by the Chinese forces, not only against Korea but against the United Nations forces carrying out the mandate of the Security Council in Korea, then how can we in the Congress or the people of America whom we represent have any assurance that they will stand up any better when the chips are down elsewhere?

Is the moral or legal obligation under the United Nations Charter to resist aggression any stronger or any weaker than the same obligations under the North Atlantic Pact formulated within the general framework of the United Nations?

The Congress and the Nation are entitled to know these answers now before we act upon legislation pending before the Congress this year and next.

Have we put too much faith in an organization which by compromising with principle will destroy its great strength—its moral leadership—while its members have weakened its potential military strength by bickering as to whether or not Western Germany, Spain, and Japan should be invited to join or be allowed to join the collective security system against aggression?

Are we justified in casting our lot with the bold new free world where there were to be no more secret deals at Yalta and no more appeasements at the expense of small nations, as at Munich, or must we consider the ideals of the Atlantic Charter and the United Nations Charter mere words to cover up the same sordid power diplomacy which, for a price, will betray human freedom once again?

We are entitled to answers to these questions now. Almost 40,000 American casualties alone demand a clear-cut answer from both the Prime Minister and the President.

America has been faced with dark days before. We hoped to meet any future ones with stanch allies in the common cause of freedom, not just regional freedom, Mr. Prime Minister. But if we have to meet them alone, perhaps it is better to find it out now.

It was not always that America met her dark days by the wringing of her hands, but by the ringing of the tocsin of freedom.

When we are asked what our foreign policy is, let us answer, "Our policy is freedom. What advances it, we support; what undermines it, we reject."

This will save us from future Yalta and Munich agreements. If others want to clasp the hand of the murderer and welcome him into their home, we do not have to stultify ourselves to that extent. Or are we now so weak that even that choice is no longer ours to make? I believe not. Some only look at our liabilities. Let us look at our assets:

First. If firmness is shown by the United Nations and by the law-abiding members of that organization, there is still time to rally the force of world public opinion in support of collective action against aggression.

Second. While the hour is very late, there is still time to enlist the support of millions of Asiatics in support of the free world. This will require:

(a) An early Japanese peace treaty, with Japan having means, under proper supervision, of participating in the collective security system against aggression. Otherwise the 80,000,000 people of Japan will be unarmed sitting ducks for Communist aggression from across the sea of Japan. The industrial potential of Japan would greatly strengthen the war-making potential of international communism and its bases in Siberia and Manchuria.

(b) Immediate economic aid and supplies of military equipment should be given to the Republic of China now on Formosa. It is vital that these 10,000,000 people and this non-Communist army, navy, and air force, with a combined strength of over 600,000, be maintained on the side of the free world. This is a larger military force than all the other non-Communist nations of Asia have put together, including what the British have in Malaya, Hong Kong, and Korea; what the French have in Indochina and Korea; and what the United States has in Korea. To permit this non-Communist stronghold to go down the drain would be the height of folly, not only because of these forces themselves, but because as long as a free China lives on Formosa, there is hope in the hearts of the non-Communist Chinese in China. By giving aid to the Republic of China, they will be able to stimulate their non-Communist guerrilla forces of over 1,000,000 men now operating behind the iron curtain. With this activity stepped up and with raids by the Chinese Nationalist forces on the coast of China, the Chinese Communists will have to begin withdrawing their forces from Manchuria and Korea, instead of concentrating them there for the destruction of the United Nations forces.

(c) Give the Chinese Communists 48 hours to stop their aggression in Korea and to get back across the Yalu River. If not, every member of the United Nations should pledge to withdraw its recognition which may have already been given to that regime. This will weaken the prestige of Mao Tse-tung at home and will make that government illegal in the eyes of the people. The recognition by India, Britain, and certain other countries early this year gave "face" to the Communists that they otherwise would not have had. They have certainly, by this act of wanton aggression against the United Nations forces, lost any claim they had to support from law-abiding nations.

It seems to me that if India is not willing to furnish troops and moral support to the United Nations action for collective security, at least she should stop giving moral support to the Communist Chinese aggressors.

(d) Furthermore, the hands of our combat commanders in Korea should be untied. Forces are now pouring down across the Yalu River and are being resupplied from well stocked depots, arsenals, gasoline supply dumps, and troop concentration points. They are coming over a network of railroads and roads in Manchuria. Strategic necessity requires that the aggressor be hit, and hit hard, in his lair. The lives of thousands of the United Nations troops and the existence of our entire force are jeopardized by present limitations in being.

I wish to digress for a moment at this point. It was only a few weeks ago that I was in Korea, where I visited our forces that were fighting. I talked with some of the combat troops who had been sent to the Yalu River area, to interdict the bridges, so that supplies could not come down. They had been given express instructions that they must not go north of the river, so their job had to be done on the south side of the Yalu. I talked to some of the men who had had many casualties in their crews. They could see the antiaircraft guns firing on them from the north side of the Yalu River. Yet the limitations imposed upon them prevented their "taking out" that antiaircraft fire. I talked with men who said they could see fighter planes rise from the airfields north of the Yalu River and attack, and inflict casualties, including deaths, among the members of the crew. Yet they could not permit our planes to pursue those fighter planes back to their lair.

When our own fighter planes would rise to give protection to our B–29's, the Communist planes would fly across the Yalu River, where the United Nations has erected an "off limits" sign, and where our planes are not permitted to pursue. I think it is rather tough to ask men to fight and perhaps to die under those conditions, when they are trying to carry out the mission which has been assigned to them, and yet when they know that day by day there are concentrations of tanks and vehicles carrying gasoline and ammunition which are being supplied to the Communist troops south of the Yalu River, who have one principal objective, namely, to destroy every United Nations' and allied soldier who has been fighting to establish a system of collective security in Korea. It is rather tough for men to fight and die under those circumstances.

Third. Make it clear that we are going to operate according to our strategic interests and not in conformity with those which the Communists might desire. We should not repeat, of course, the mistakes made by France and Germany in their land invasions into the vast areas of Russia by any thought of having the American or United Nations Army go into the vastness of China. To the contrary, we should operate from strength, not from weakness. Our strength is air and naval power. We should place, in conjunction with the Navy of the Republic of China, an immediate naval blockade against the entire China coast, and should not permit the entry or exit of a vessel of any nationality. This will dry up a large part of the trade in gasoline and strategic materials which has been openly going on for over 6 months when the "neutralization" of Formosa prevented the continuation of a fairly effective blockade by the Navy of the Republic of China.

I wish to pause here for a moment to pay my compliments and respects to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] for the job which he and his committee have been trying to do. I wish to say that I was deeply shocked by what I found in Hong Kong about the amount of trade in gasoline and other strategic materials which has been going on from that British Crown colony to the Chinese Communists, and undoubtedly those materials are being used against us today in North Korea. I wish to say that we ourselves are not entirely free from the criticism which can justly be leveled in that connection, because supplies which have been carried from the United States and in American bottoms have found their way in helping the war machine of the Chinese Communists. I think it is a sad situation when it is recalled that Members of the Congress of the United States, not last month or 2 months ago or 6 months ago but a year or 2 years or more than 2 years ago, urged that some effort be made to stop that flow of illegal material. Some of us remember that in 1939, 1940, and early 1941 there was going from Pacific coast ports scrap iron and oil which were to be used against our historic friends in China by the then Japanese war lords, and some of that same material was used against us on the morning of December 7 at Pearl Harbor. Some of us on the floor of the Senate have tried to point out time and time again that it was the duty of the Government of the United States long ago to take an active part in stopping that trade. Yet I just took from the ticker, in the room adjoining the Senate Chamber, this interesting dispatch:

EXPORT CONTROLS

WASHINGTON.—Tight new controls were applied—

Parenthetically, when were they applied, Mr. President? They were applied—today on shipments through United States ports to Russia and her satellite countries and to China, Hong Kong, and Macao.

A Government order Saturday—

In other words, the past Saturday—to clamp down on all American goods destined for Red China, Hong Kong, and Macao became effective last midnight (e. s. t.).

Secretary Sawyer said the same controls will apply to foreign shipments of strategic commodities passing through American ports en route to this far eastern area, the Soviet Union, and its satellites.

Mr. President, it seems to me that is just a little late, because when I was in Korea, several weeks ago, the army of the United Nations and the Army of the United States had clearly identified organized Chinese divisions which had been there since October, opposing the the forces of the United Nations. It seems to me that it is just a little late for our great Government to be so tied up in red tape or inefficiency, or both, that it cannot properly meet this issue, when Americans are dying in a foreign field without a declaration of war. At least we had an obligation to do our utmost to prevent the shipment of a single gallon of gasoline, a single bit of steel or of other strategic material, a single lathe, or any kind of equipment which would build up the power of the Soviet Union or any of its satellites. It seems to me a little late for the embargo to be placed today.

Mr. President, if I speak feelingly, it is only because I have seen men from California and men from almost every other State of the Union fighting in Korea under what I believe to be the most difficult situation which any Americans have been called upon to face, not excepting either World War I or World War II. Our men are at least entitled to the fullest support of every Member of the legislative branch of the Government of the United States and of every person holding any position of responsibility in the executive branch of the Government of the United States, and there should not be a single person, regardless of this capacity, who does not strain himself to the utmost to give them the backing they require and to prevent the backing being given to the men who are shooting them down today, many of them in cold blood. With air power we should strike at the war plants that are supplying the Communist aggressor. For this job we should immediately take more of our naval vessels and more of our bombers out of mothballs.

Fourth. Let us recognize that our most priceless commodity is time. Stop dilly-dallying on mobilization of our manpower and industrial capacity. Let our North Atlantic Allies know that it is long past time for them to be bickering over the rearming of Western Germany and the bringing of Spain and Japan into the collective defense system. Let us make it clear that now is the time for every supporter of freedom to stand up and be counted. If our structure is infested with Munich appeasement termites, let us find it out now.

Fifth. The United States should maintain its lead in atomic development. The weapon should not be used except as a last resort to protect the free world against enslavement. It should only be used then on targets of real opportunity. It is my belief that the military targets north of the Yalu River, from which the aggressor is resupplying himself, can be better handled by other weapons of a more conventional type. But the President of the United States should make it clear to Mr. Attlee that we have no intention of giving him or anyone else a veto over the use of the atomic weapon. We are not going to be destroyed as a Nation, or permit a free world of free men to be destroyed, while someone else is passing judgment on whether or not aggression is really aggression.

Sixth. After 4 months of Soviet lies and obstructions in the United Nations let us be realists and understand that Soviet talk of peace is but a mask for aggression. No nation could tolerate, in positions of authority within its gates in time of war, those who gave aid and comfort to the enemy. Nor can the United Nations survive with obstructionists, traitors, and saboteurs occupying positions of responsibility while United Nations forces are doing battle against an aggressor. The Soviet Union on its record of supplying equipment and moral support to the North Korean and Chinese Communist aggressors should be forthwith expelled from the United Nations.

The timid will say these are strong moves and the Nation will risk war by carrying them out. My answer to that is that time is not necessarily on our side. We have a better chance to gain a decent world in which international law and order will prevail, and where the small nation is not at the mercy of a large aggressor nation if the free world stands firm now.

But a far eastern Munich now will destroy the faith of millions of freemen all around the periphery of the Soviet Union. Each one, with considerable justification will think, if Korea or the Republic of China on Formosa is sacrificed now, how can we know that Japan, the Philippines, Siam, Pakistan, Iran, Turkey, Greece, Germany, Denmark, or Norway will not be a future victim of a middle eastern or European Munich?

If the free world kowtows to aggression in Asia now all of Asia will be lost and the lesson will be learned with bitterness by freemen everywhere that international communism stands firmly with its friends, while the western world runs out on theirs. Do you think you will build strength and loyalty on the part of any man regardless of his geographic location or the color of his skin? The answer is "No."

Does any man really think that after the Soviet Union has had a year or two or three to build up its stockpile of atomic weapons and to digest into its system the manpower and resources of Asia, that you will be better able as freemen to resist another fait accompli aggression better than you are the clear-cut one in Korea today? I think not.

This is a fateful hour in the history of our Nation and of the entire free world. Cringe before Communist aggression today and countless men who are now free may be bending their backs in the slave-labor camps of Siberia a year or two from now. Stand up to Communist aggression today, and millions who are now enslaved in Poland, the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, and China will gain new hope that they, too, may some day be free from the most godless tyranny man has ever known. We should now repudiate the Yalta agreement and reendorse the Atlantic Charter.

If we as Americans show the same courage and common sense that motivated the men who sat at Philadelphia and gave us the Declaration of Independence and later the Constitution of the United States there is no domestic problem we cannot solve and there is no foreign foe we need ever fear.

Mr. President, I should like to ask to have printed in the body of the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks an editorial which appeared in the San Francisco (Calif.) Peoples World, which is a Communist mouthpiece, in which is suggested this appeasement program which is the general policy of the Soviet Union and its satellites.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also ask that there be printed in the body of the RECORD a pamphlet which was distributed in Butte, Mont., by the Communist Party of Montana on December 1, the night that I spoke on far eastern policy in that city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also ask that two articles, of tremendous significance as I believe, be added to the RECORD at this point. The first is an article entitled "Is Siberia Russia's Secret Base for World Conquest?" written by Richard Wilson, and published in the current issue of Look magazine, under date of December 5, 1950.

The next is an article entitled "We Can Be Guerrillas Too," written by Stewart Alsop and Col. Samuel B. Griffith, United States Marine Corps, published in the December 2, 1950, issue of the Saturday Evening Post. I ask that the two articles be printed in the body of the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits 3 and 4.)

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire in the first place to commend the Senator from California for his splendid presentation of this issue. I merely want to reaffirm, if I understood him correctly, the statement that in his judgment any appeasement or backing away from the issue today and the recognition by the UN or otherwise of Communist China would mean the loss of the Far East so far as the western powers are concerned. The Far East would be threatened with being completely turned over to the control of the Soviet Union.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I may say to the Senator from New Jersey that I very deeply feel that any far eastern Munich now would cost us the entire Far East, involving more than a billion and a half people; and now, with the Chinese Communist movement into Tibet, I do not think that the time which India has left to her is very long.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an insertion?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. O'CONOR. It is a somewhat more than an insertion, but in view of the statement made by the distinguished senior Senator from California I think it might be of interest to the Senate to have read into the RECORD the contents of a telegram which has reached the junior Senator from Maryland since the convening of the Senate today. It is sent by the crew members of the Flying Clipper, a ship carrying the American flag, from Hong Kong. The text of the telegram is as follows:

HERBERT R. O'CONOR,
Senate.

Sail for Communist China December 5—

That is tomorrow; the telegram is dated today—carrying steel tin-plate pipes. Please take action if possible.

Mr. President, I should like to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD from today's Washington News an article appearing under the headline of a news item, which headline reads as follows:

United States ship will take steel plates to Mao.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement relative to the imposition of export controls, which I have prepared.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I wonder whether the Senator would mind asking that the material he desires to insert be printed in the RECORD immediately following the insertions I have made, since it relates to the general subject to the Far East.

Mr. O'CONOR. I should like to make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Due to the fact that there is a difference in the international date line, I am afraid that ship is sailing today.

Mr. O'CONOR. We had noted that fact, and are making representations to the proper officials in connection with it.

TO HALT A DISASTER

The peace of the world may well depend on what the American people can do to check the plans of Gen. Douglas MacArthur and the "big brass" in Washington to continue the Korean War and extend it into Manchuria.

After an interview with MacArthur, Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND, Republican, California, urged that United States planes bomb Manchuria. There is little doubt on the basis of inspired stories and statements from Tokyo that MacArthur advocates such a course.

And if this happens, it will mean war against the 450,000,000 people of China, against the 200,000,000 people of the Soviet Union allied with China, against the peace-loving peoples of all Europe and all Asia.

This is a policy which can only mean disaster for the American people. To prevent this disaster a national conference last week end in New York urged an alternative policy.

A drive for an immediate "cease fire" in Korea to stop spread of the war.

A national campaign for recognition of China and its admission to UN.

A variety of expressions of friendship to China on the occasion of the arrival here of the Chinese delegation which will discuss the Formosa question at the United Nations.

These are objectives which will command the support of millions of Americans of all political affiliations.

They will give an effective focus to the confused and inarticulate peace sentiments of the people which were expressed in distorted fashion in last Tuesday's election.

Moreover, a real campaign behind these aims will make it possible to arrest the mad adventure which began with United States intervention in Korea and may end by spreading the flames of war to all Asia and the entire world.

We urge that progressive, labor, and Negro groups on the west coast give the most urgent and serious support to this campaign for peace rather than war with China.

EXHIBIT 2

Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, Republican, of California, publisher of the Oakland Tribune, will speak in Butte Friday evening on the war situation in the Far East.

According to the Montana Standard, he comes to Butte "directly from the theater of war from conferences with Gen. Douglas MacArthur and discussions with other high military, political, and economic figures all across the Pacific board. He has had opportunity to gather facts at first hand throughout the perimeter of the Korean conflict."

Together with the majority of the American people who are anxious to avoid a third world war, we Communists hope the Senator will raise his voice in behalf of peace.

We hope the Senator will answer these questions in his Butte speech Friday:

First question: "Senator, is it not possible to arrive at a negotiated peace in Korea on the basis of the withdrawal of all foreign troops, leaving it to the Korean people themselves to work out their own destiny? After what has happened thus far in Korea, it is obvious that a continuation of the war threatens world peace very seriously. Let's end it before the whole world becomes a battleground."

Second question: "What is wrong with trying to work out over the council tables the peaceful coexistence of the two systems, capitalism and communism? War has not proved capable of destroying communism in any case, since the first war was followed by the Russian Revolution and the Second World War by the Chinese, Polish, Czech, and other Communist victories. What about peaceful competition between the two systems?"

Third question: "Wasn't it to be expected that the Chinese People's Republic would react vigorously to the war approaching its borders? Our reaction to a similar situation in, for example, lower California moving toward San Diego. The Montana Standard of November 30 quotes disagreement with our military policies in Korea on the part of leading French and British officials. After all, we are not on good terms with China, since we have opposed their having a seat in the United Nations and protect Chiang Kai-shek on Formosa."

Fourth question: "Can you guarantee from your discussions on the scene that there is no danger that our authorities will extend the war to new areas or resort to atomic or bacteriological weapons? The bombing of the Chinese mainland might very well begin a world-wide conflict."

Senator, you have it in your power to raise your voice for immediate steps to end the war in the Far East.

Senator, the people of America and the world want peace.

IS SIBERIA RUSSIA'S SECRET BASE FOR WORLD CONQUEST?

(By Richard Wilson)

Deep behind the iron curtain, in the little-known reaches of Siberia, the Soviet Union today is building a vast military-industrial empire.

It's a new center of power that poses a threat to Alaska, Japan, and perhaps all of Asia.

These facts emerged recently when Look commissioned a University of California research assistant to complete and bring up to date a detailed study of Siberian military and economic strength.

The research assistant, Steven P. Nagel, is no novice at sifting information. He took part in the interrogation of 25,000 German prisoners in World War II and was wounded three times in field intelligence operations. His study of Siberia covered a 2-year period of research in Russian publications and published British, American, and French intelligence, and included assistance from United States officials who themselves were studying the new Soviet Empire. Here are Nagel's principal findings:

SIBERIAN ARMIES NUMBER 750,000 TROOPS

At least 750,000 troops—the cream of the Red Army—are training in Siberia and waiting for whatever mission may be assigned them by the Politburo.

The Siberian troops make up a minimum of 44 front-line divisions—many of them air-borne or armored.

They are reinforced by a powerful air force and navy. The air force, it's estimated, numbers 4,500 planes. The navy is believed to include 100 submarines.

INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION TRANSFORMS WILDERNESS

Meanwhile, an industrial revolution is changing the face of the Siberian wilderness. New factories have been built. Whole industries have been transferred from Russia proper.

In an area where less than 5,000,000 people lived in 1926, the population today easily exceeds 10,000,000 and may reach 15,000,000.

Other sources indicate that the new Siberian empire may be even more powerful than Nagel's findings suggest. In any event, it's clear that Moscow is creating a self-contained military-economic unit in eastern Siberia—one, and perhaps the most important, of six separate areas of the Soviet Union that are being organized to stand on their own in war or peace.

"The Russians," a State Department official told me, "have built something big and dangerous in Siberia."

A great network of military bases and industrial centers covers eastern Siberia.

Nagel's research, summarized in the map, shows how the new empire has grown:

The region includes several armies, scores of airfields and at least 12 naval bases.

General headquarters for the Siberian armies, which together form Russia's Sixth Army Group, is at Chita, near Lake Baikal, at lower left of map. From there, military bases fan out through the highly industrialized area opposite Japan to remote bases in the north barely 100 miles from Alaska.

BIG ARMY GUARDS INDUSTRIES

The Siberian First Army, with headquarters at Komsomolsk, guards the industrial center of eastern Siberia, which extends from the Sea of Japan to Skovorodino. This army is estimated to number 300,000 men, or 19 divisions, including five airborne and five armored.

Second Army headquarters is at Vladivostok. Six divisions are located in this area, for Vladivostok is not only Russia's most important naval base; it is also a jumping-off place for any Soviet drive south.

Dairen is the site of Third Army headquarters. About 290 air miles from Seoul, prewar capital of Korea, Dairen came into Soviet hands by agreements at Yalta. No information is available on the strength of the Third Army.

In the far north lies one of the strangest and certainly one of the most audacious of the world's military installations. This is the Siberian Fourth Army, based at Anadyr, not far from Bering Strait, which separates Siberia from Alaska.

It's believed this army is composed of five divisions, of which three are airborne. Though based in the desolate wastes just below the Arctic Circle, its troops are maintained and supplied regularly.

Additional divisions comprising a fifth army are also known to be based in Siberia.

Along with these armies, there is a mighty array of air power. A chain of airfields extends through the eastern area to accommodate the 4,500 planes that make up the Siberian Air Force. Some 30 fields, originally built to fight the Japanese, are reported in the Vladivostok area alone.

SIBERIAN NAVY HAS SNORKELS

Russian sea power in the Far East is a significant factor, too. Of the 100 Soviet submarines believed to be in Pacific waters, most were designed for coastal operations. But also included are some of the Russian Navy's high speed, snorkel type of submarines developed by German engineers. In addition, the cruisers Kalinin and Kaganovich are often observed at Vladivostok.

Reflecting the industrial development of Siberia are cities like Komsomolsk. One of the new, important cities of Siberia, it had a population in 1940 of 70,000. Today, its population is reported to be 250,000. The city now boasts steel mills, an airplane-engine plant, a locomotive works, repair shops and automotive and generator works.

Magadan is another mushrooming city. A small fishing village in 1940, it has grown into a city of 100,000 today—a prison city with 80 percent of its population Soviet citizens exiled for minor infractions. It's believed to be an important administrative center for nearby gold mines.

Khabarovsk, too, has grown rapidly and is now an important oil-refining center. Some experts think its population is greater than Vladivostok's 600,000. It is also the site of an airframe manufacturing plant. There is a second one at Irkutsk.

In the area of Chita are mines and smelters for coal, iron, manganese, lead, zinc, and molybdenum. Properly developed, such resources could lead to the rise of a "Ruhr" in Siberia.

PURPOSE OF THE MILITARY-INDUSTRIAL CONCENTRATION IN SIBERIA HAS UNITED STATES PLANNERS GUESSING BUT ON GUARD

The Soviet concentration of power in Siberia poses the keenest problem for the United States. Why is the concentration there?

There are several possible reasons, all of which may apply:

It could be a move in preparation for an attack on Alaska.

It could be a build-up for an ultimate invasion of Japan.

Or it could be a naked show of strength as notice to all Asia that it is under the control of the Kremlin.

Military circles fully recognize the threat of an attack on Alaska. The military command in Alaska is faced daily with the problem of what to do if Russia's Siberian arsenal erupts into a North American invasion. Anchorage, Alaska, is an armed camp, with antiaircraft batteries manned 24 hours a day and jet-fighter squadrons constantly on the alert. Even foxholes have been dug.

ALASKA FORCES ARE OUTNUMBERED

But more than alertness may be needed.

Even if the five Soviet divisions on the other side of Bering Strait are far below strength, which is entirely probable, our own forces are greatly outnumbered. It is doubtful if we have the strength of a single division in all Alaska.

That does not mean that Anchorage is beset by anxiety. Brig. Gen. Elmer Rogers, chief of staff to the Alaskan commander, Lt. Gen. William E. Kepner, recently told a reporter:

"Well, I'm sitting on the powder keg, if there is one, and I am not alarmed. I'm not saying that we have an impregnable fortress here. But I do feel that reasonable defense forces have been allocated and are on the scene."

Military planners in Alaska count on Russia's obviously great difficulties in supplying an attack. They also feel more comfortable than the situation might appear to warrant because the heart of Alaska, where the main airfields are, is 600 miles from the Russian bases. Thus, while the possibility is conceded that a Russian attack might be able to envelop Nome, taking all Alaska is quite another thing.

AN ALASKAN PEARL HARBOR?

Still, the Siberian situation arouses concern, Gov. Ernest Gruening, of Alaska, forecasts the possibility of another Pearl Harbor there. And I have talked to Russians here who insist that a powerful thrust against the United States will originate in the not-too-distant future from Siberia.

One such warning comes from Lt. Piotr Uirogov, of the Red air force, who escaped from the Soviet Union last year via Austria.

"I have served in Siberia," Pirogov says. "I know how the Soviet air force is indoctrinated. Every Soviet officer believes that the only way into the United States is through Alaska.

"These officers have been taught that Alaska is Russia earth; that Catherine the Great was cheated out of it by avaricious Americans; that its gold, minerals, and other resources have been shamefully exploited by American capitalists; that Alaska must be reclaimed for the Soviet Union. Every Soviet officer is expected to know this."

Pirogov says his air-force colleagues when he was in Siberia were told they were there because Alaska must be attacked. They felt this was confirmed by joint maneuvers they engaged in with Russian Navy and ground forces. All the topographical details of Alaska were taught them, together with detailed plans for bombing Alaska.

However, another theory on the reasons for the build-up in Siberia—that it's aimed at Japan—must also be considered. According to an opinion commanding respect in Washington, the Russians were disappointed with the concessions they got at Yalta, which gave them approximately what they had before the Russo-Japanese War.

The Russians hoped, it's reasoned, that Japan itself would fall under Soviet influence. Instead, they have watched it grow stronger and stronger under American control. They fear it will be set loose before long, to develop again as the leading industrial-military nation of the Far East. Because of this fear, the Russians may have concluded that Japan will have to be smashed before it grows too powerful.

That line of reasoning makes much sense at high levels in Washington. The fact that it may be less disquieting to us than the Alaskan invasion theory does not necessarily detract from its logic.

What about the third possibility—that the new Siberian empire is a show of strength to make all Asia bow to Russia? There is no way of evaluating this possibility fully. It's pertinent to recall, however, that Moscow has made conquests in eastern Europe by the mere threat of force.

But whatever the reasons for the Soviet concentration of power in Siberia, there's no hiding the main facts of the tremendous military and economic program being developed there.

REDS RATE SIBERIAN ARMIES HIGH

The findings of Nagel's study, outlined on the preceding pages, make a startling picture.

Most impressive of Nagel's facts is the Soviet military establishment of 44 front-line divisions on what Moscow calls its far-eastern front.

It's evident that the Kremlin attaches great importance to the "front." In 1948, a prominent World War II military leader, Marshal Gregory K. Zhukov, was in command of the Siberian armies. More recently, another Soviet hero, Marshal R. Y. Malinovsky, has been the top military officer.

"SIBERIAN ARMIES BEST IN U. S. S. R."

Lieutenant Pirogov, the escaped Russian flier, stresses the toughness of the Red troops in Siberia. "It is an accepted fact," he says, "that the Siberian armies are the best in the Soviet Union. When Moscow was being attacked, Stalin told us: 'Hold on, hold on, the Siberian armies are coming.' And they did." The result was a decisive defeat for the Nazi armies.

The industrial base on which this military establishment rests, as disclosed by Nagel's research, is hardly less impressive. So far, it probably has not been developed sufficiently to supply the military establishment completely. But the fact that it exists at all is a miracle. Thirty years ago, eastern Siberia was largely a wilderness inhabited by primitive Siberian tribes.

Today, the area is estimated to account for 17 percent of Russia's steel production, 27 percent of its coal, and 5 percent of its oil. This output is small compared with that of the United States, of course, but it is there on the spot. It does not have to be transported thousands of miles by land or sea. The same is true of Russian munitions production in Siberia, of which there is thought to be a significant amount.

Ironically, the Soviet Union owes some of its strength in Siberia to the United States. In the days when we were urging Stalin to get into war against Japan, we sent to Siberia lend-lease supplies totaling some 800,000 tons of military and industrial material. As events developed, the supplies were not needed for the defeat of Japan. And instead of helping us, they have become part of the Soviet reservoir of power now lined up against us.

One of the puzzles of Soviet industry in Siberia is a continuing effort to produce more and more gold. Some 25 mines are in operation at Magadan and in the area south of Yakutsk and north of Chita. Gold production there equals almost half the world's production in 1940. It makes Russia a close competitor of the United States as the world's leading hoarder of gold.

The most frequently suggested reason for the Soviet gold hoard is that Russia will some day try to wreck the economies of the world by wholesale dumping of the metal on the world market. But for every expert who thinks this is the reason there is another who does not. The Kremlin is playing this one close to the chest.

EMPIRE FACES OBSTACLES

A number of obstacles prevent the maximum development of the Siberian empire. The climate, of course, is the most important. Transportation is another, though in military matters the Red Army usually manages to move somehow in areas where movement is regarded as impossible by westerners. Two rail lines run east and west, and if they were cut, large-scale military and industrial movements would be seriously interfered with.

The lack of electrical power, plus the difficulties of transmitting over long distances, is a definitely limiting factor too. But there is plenty of coal, and the Soviets may some day be able to expand their power resources substantially. Estimated coal reserves are 460,000,000,000 tons, one of the largest in the world, and of a quality similar to coal mined at Cardiff, Wales.

A most serious limiting factor is the supply of food. Five percent of Russia's population is in eastern Siberia, but the area produces only 1 percent of Russia's food.

The development of the area, nevertheless, has been extraordinary, as disclosed by Nagel's study.

And Nagel's findings are conservatively based on what he can prove. It's possible that the military and economic development of Siberia considerably exceeds even his basic figures.

EXILES SWELL POPULATION

Pirogov thinks—though he can't prove it—that there is a population of eighteen or twenty millions in eastern Siberia, as compared with Nagel's figure of at least 10,500,000.

Of the total Nagel says 700,000 are in forced-labor camps; 1,000,000 are exiles from the Baltic region and 600,000 are Japanese prisoners from the Kwantung Army. Pirogov puts the number at forced labor higher and thinks there are even more exiles.

According to his estimates, the number of forced laborers runs into the millions, maybe 8 or 12. "Nobody hunts wild animals in Siberia any more," he comments, "only people who escape from the labor camps."

Besides exiles from the Baltic region, Pirogov says there are also millions moved in a body from other areas.

"In the years 1941 to 1943," he claims, "industrial plants were moved from the west into the Siberian area, together with workers and their entire families.

"This was followed in 1944 with the forced exile of two groups, one from South Russia and the other from the Crimea. In each group, we were told, there were 1,000,000 people.

"From 1945 to 1947, 25 percent of the population of western Ukraine was transferred to the Siberian area."

SIBERIA A MUST FOR RED AIR FORCE

What about the build-up of military forces in Siberia? "In 1947 and 194^," Pirogov reports, "there was a reshuffling of Soviet Air Force personnel. Every air-force officer was required to spend 2 years in one of three places: Chukotski (the area in the far north facing Bering Strait); Kamchatka (the peninsula thrusting out from Siberia) or Sakhalin (the island whose southern half was given to Russia at Yalta)."

As to the number of troops in Siberia, Pirogov thinks there are even more than the 750,000 estimated by Nagel. He figures at least 1,000,000 are now stationed there.

Regardless of the exact statistics, however, it's plain that the Soviet empire in Siberia introduces a critical new element in the cauldron of world affairs today.

And the day may soon come when it will emerge as the dominant power in the Far East.

[From the Saturday Evening Post of December 2, 1950]

WE CAN BE GUERRILLAS, TOO

(By Stewart Alsop and Col. Samuel B. Griffith, USMC)

On October 1 this year, by all the traditional rules of warfare, the war in Korea was finished. The North Korean Army was destroyed as an organized fighting force. But on that day, the No. 2 man in Communist China, Premier Chou En-lai, served notice that the war in Korea was not finished. Chou En-lai's warning was double-barreled. On the one hand, he warned that China would not stand idly by while China's Communist allies were defeated, a threat he has since made good.

But this was not the Chinese premier's only threat. "Tactics of a prolonged war of resistance," he also said, "will undoubtedly give the Korean people * * * final victory." What Chou En-lai was talking about, of course, was guerrilla war, supported by the Chinese, and directed against the American and Allied forces, all over liberated Korea.

It remains to be seen whether this threat will also be made good—the Korean people have already experienced at first hand the doubtful delights of Communist rule, and they are hardly likely to wish to repeat the experience. Yet Chou En-lai's second threat must be taken as seriously as his first. For it is time we recognized that the traditional rules of warfare no longer hold good.

It is time, indeed, that we learned about guerrilla fighting. We must learn how to support, fight with, and even create friendly guerrilla movements. What is more difficult, we must learn how to deal effectively with enemy guerrilla movements. If we do not, it is entirely possible that we shall lose the struggle which has been joined in this nightmare twilight between war and peace. And it is just as possible that we shall lose a war, if real war comes.

For it can be shown that guerrilla fighting can have a very great, and sometimes an absolutely decisive, influence on the outcome of modern war. It can further be shown that, since the last war ostensibly ended, guerrilla warfare has deeply influenced the course of events, gravely to our disadvantage. Finally, it can be shown that the men in the Kremlin confidently rely on Communist guerrilla warfare to overbalance the industrial and atomic superiority of the West, whether in time of war or in time of so-called peace.

These are some of the reasons why we must learn about guerrilla warfare. There was a time when Americans were the greatest of all guerrilla fighters. The minutemen of the Revolution were essentially guerrillas. In Francis Marion, the Swamp Fox, who made life miserable for Lord Cornwallis, we produced one of history's most brilliant guerrilla leaders. In John S. Mosby, who, with a few hundred men behind the Union lines, tied down many thousands of Grant's best troops, we produced another.

But that was long ago. Now the experience of living Americans in guerrilla warfare is almost wholly limited to the vague memories of the American soldiers who fought in Europe—memories of unkempt, excitable Europeans, armed to the teeth and incomprehensibly oratorical, sometimes useful, but more often seemingly in the way.

Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower himself is the authority for the statement that these excitable Europeans were worth 15 divisions to the Allies in western Europe. In southeastern Europe, Yugoslav and Greek guerrillas tied down no less than 45 of Hitler's German and satellite divisions, although he needed only 30 divisions to take these countries in the first place. Yet this evidence of the extraordinary effectiveness of guerrilla fighting has been largely lost on our professional soldiers. In the Pentagon, as in most conventional military circles in the West, guerrilla warfare is still regarded as an interesting but essentially unimportant footnote to the ancient art of making war.

Alone among the great nations of the earth, the United States has never in living memory feared a successful enemy invasion. This is one reason why it is so hard for most Americans—professional soldiers or otherwise—to take guerrilla warfare seriously. Let us, therefore, ask you, the reader, to perform a rather grim act of imagination.

Please imagine that the United States has been invaded by the Red army—and that you live in the area occupied by Russian troops. Once this difficult feat of imagination has been performed, it should be less difficult to imagine that you want to do everything in your power to help the American forces still fighting at the front. So you join the organized resistance—you become a guerrilla. Let us follow you as you perform a guerrilla mission.

It is dusk. You are on a secondary road, not many miles from where you now live. With you are five men, armed like yourself with Tommy guns or rifles, grenades strung in their belts. The lead man moves warily, for there is always the risk of a Red Army patrol.

Ahead of you the road curves off to the left and crosses a double railway track in a deep cut. You and another man drop into a ditch, while the three others make their way cautiously to the track. Soon you hear a soft whistle. The track is clear. This does not surprise you—the Russians cannot possibly guard the hundreds of thousands of miles of track in occupied territory.

THE WAY THE RESISTANCE WORKS

You move onto the track, and the other men spread out as lookouts. It is darker now; you can only dimly make out their figures. You kneel beside the track and pack about 3 pounds of something that looks like putty on both sides of a rail, fixing it in place with ordinary black mechanic's tape. Then you wire something that looks like a child's Fourth of July toy on top of the rail. The whole job takes perhaps 3 or 4 minutes.

Two hours later, you and the other men are many miles away, sleeping peacefully in a hayloft on an isolated farm. While you are sleeping, a Red Army troop train on its way to the front roars into the cut. The front right wheel of the engine passes over the toylike object you have wired to the track. The object is a percussion cap. It is connected by an instantaneous fuse to the puttylike substance, which is plastic explosive. In the instant when the wheel passes over the percussion cap, there is a small explosion and the rail under the wheel disintegrates. The engine jumps the tracks and rolls up against the side of the cut. Cars pile up behind it in ugly, twisted wreckage.

Using a few dollars' worth of material, you have wrecked an irreplaceable train, killed or wounded many enemy soldiers, and severed an important transportation route to the front. You have done all this both more cheaply and more surely than it could have done in the conventional way—from the air. Looks easy, doesn't it?

And it is easy, remarkably easy. This imaginary exploit of yours was repeated literally hundreds of thousands of times during the last war, so that the rail systems in western Europe and in Russia became almost wholly useless to Hitler.

But it is easy only if—there are a number of if's. Ask yourself some questions and you will begin to understand the nature of modern guerrilla warfare. How could you be sure that informers would not betray you? Obviously, a good many people would know what you were doing. Equally obviously, the Russian commander would pay high for the privilege of hanging you most publicly, after appropriate tortures, in order to discourage others of like mind. Without the active sympathy of the mass of your compatriots, you would not long survive. And you need not only sympathy but support—information, food, safe shelter.

This suggests one reason why guerrilla war, the war of the ragged civilian with a rifle, has suddenly become of paramount importance in the era of the guided missile and the atomic bomb. Modern war is intensely political. The day of the old, simple, straightforward clash between nation states seeking limited objectives is over. Modern war is fought not only between nations but within nations. This was true of Hitler's war. It will be far more true of Stalin's war, if it comes.

Guerrilla warfare, political by its very nature, part civil war, part rebellion, is the natural expression of the war within. Because of its political nature, it requires the active support of the mass of the people. Given this support, guerrilla fighting becomes a fourth dimension of warfare. It can make as decisive a contribution to victory as any of the conventional services—the Navy, the Army, the Air Force. But it must be supported by an effective organization on the other side of front lines. Ask yourself some more questions, and you will see why this is so.

How did you get the weapons to protect yourself—the rifles and grenades and Tommy guns? How did you get the tools to do your job—the percussion cap, the instantaneous fuse, the plastic explosive? How did you know that a troop train was coming over that particular track at that particular time? How did you know how to blow up the train? The technique is simple, but not every civilian knows it. Do you? Finally, how did you know that by blowing up that particular train you would really contribute to the strategic objectives of the American regular forces fighting at the front?

Three modern technical devices—the plane, the parachute, and the radio—provide the answers to all these questions. This is the second reason why guerrilla warfare has suddenly become a decisive element in modern war. For it is now possible to support guerrillas on a massive scale. The radio provides the means of communicating with the fighters behind the lines, coordinating their actions with the larger strategy of total war. The plane and the parachute provide the means of supplying them with the wherewithal to fight.

The logistical support of guerrilla warfare is a job for highly trained professionals. This is a big subject in itself, but what follows may give you some idea of the sort of thing you need. You must have codes which are simple and virtually unbreakable. You must have radios which can be easily carried, which can be hand-operated, and which can be used to transmit and receive in code at very high speeds. If the radio is on the air too long, the enemy will get a fix on the location of guerrilla headquarters, using mobile radio-direction finders, with disastrous consequences.

You must have all sorts of special devices for bringing planes in over very small dropping zones—known as Dee Zeds in the trade—at night in enemy territory. The primitive way to do this is by agreed signal lights or even brush fires lighted on a prearranged pattern, tended by guerrilla reception committees. These reception committees guide the planes into the Dee Zed, and then haul away and hide the parachuted containers of weapons and supplies. The trouble is that the enemy can set up false reception committees. This the Germans did in the last war, using them just the way a duck hunter uses his decoys. A plane with bomb bays open to parachute, slowed down to stalling speed over an area well stacked with antiaircraft guns, is a very dead duck indeed.

Toward the end of the war various gimmicks were developed to outwit the Germans—Rebecca-Eureka two-way electronic bleep devices, for example, to guide a pilot in over a Dee Zed from great distances on an agreed signal, or the S-phone, which permitted a man on the ground to talk a pilot in over the Dee Zed. For effective guerrilla support, you need this sort of thing—and much more which is still secret.

Even more, you need trained men—specially trained pilots and navigators to drop thousands of tons of weapons and supplies on pin-point targets at night behind enemy lines; radio operators able to send and receive in code at 30 words a minute under the worst possible conditions; liaison officers who speak the language, who can train guerrillas in the use of the parachuted weapons, who know your political and strategic objectives, and who can promote these objectives effectively. The task of supplying friendly guerrillas in wartime is a job for professionals.

The job on the other side of the lines—in enemy territory—is a job for professionals, too. Guerrilla fighting is highly specialized, different from any other. A regular infantry commander is no more trained to lead guerrillas than he is to lead a flight of bombers. It is the infantryman's job to take and hold ground, at whatever bloody cost. A true guerrilla never tries to hold ground. If he does, he is soon a dead guerrilla.

The French summed up guerrilla tactics in three words, drummed into the heads of recruits to the French Maquis: "Surprise, mitraillage, évanouissement." These three words—which can be roughly translated as "surprise, shoot, scram"—give a mental picture of the classic guerrilla operation. An unsuspecting and unready enemy unit—a supply convoy, a headquarters behind the front—is suddenly and viciously attacked. Then the guerrillas run—they run like the devil. Before a counterattack can be organized, the guerrillas have vanished. What is an enemy commander to do when the men who have been massacring his forces from concealed positions, instead of presenting a bold and united front, simply disappear?

Regular army troops are not encouraged to memorize the old couplet, "He who fights and runs away will live to fight another day." Yet this precisely describes correct guerrilla tactics. Mao Tse-tung, ruler of Communist China, and, as we shall see, the greatest professional guerrilla of our generation, put it another way: "Guerrillas should be as cautious as virgins and as quick as rabbits."

This suggests a rather surprising characteristic of properly led guerrilla warfare. It is really not a very dangerous sort of fighting. After all, an infantryman who was as cautious as a virgin and as quick—to run—as a rabbit would not be much of an infantryman. The few hundred Americans who parachuted to the resistance movement in the last war, asked about their war experiences, are apt to respond with the white-knuckled, tight-lipped, glassy-eyed routine. They like to think of themselves as heroes. A few of them were. Most of them were nothing of the sort.

Over-all, they took less than 10 percent casualties. This is about the average percentage in months of guerrilla operations—less than a good infantry outfit would expect in an afternoon's rather desultory battle. Yet though guerrilla casualties are almost always low, guerrillas can inflict an enormous amount of damage. To quote Mao Tse-tung again: "Guerrillas may be compared to innumerable gnats, which, by biting a giant in front and rear, ultimately exhaust him." The giant can rarely bite the gnats back.

Because a guerrilla attack is always a surprise attack, a properly led guerrilla movement should inflict casualties of at least 10 dead enemy to 1 dead guerrilla—and in the last war, the ratio was quite often as high as 50 to 1. Moreover, killing enemy troops is only part of a guerrilla's job. More often, he is attacking objects which don't fight back—like the railway track in your imaginary exploit, or a power station, or a bridge. Or he is collecting information—a good guerrilla leader knows everything—absolutely everything—about the enemy, and this information is invaluable on both sides of the front lines.

Indeed, a resistance movement which does nothing at all but collect information about the enemy is of enormous value, if the information can be transmitted to the other side of the lines. And the radio makes this possible. But it is the plane and the parachute which have transformed the guerrilla art, adding a whole new dimension to modern war.

No one who has ever experienced what the French called a parachutage will ever forget it—the nervous waiting in the darkness; the distant drone of engines, growing nearer; the frantic blinking of the recognition signal as the uncertain outlines of the great planes become visible against the night sky; then the sharp crack of the parachutes, opening like ghostly flowers in the dimness as the heavy metal containers sway down to earth.

Among the men of the resistance, as they lugged the containers off to hiding places and opened them, there was always something of the hysterical joy of small children opening their Christmas stockings. But this was no mere childish joy. For the containers, full of weapons and supplies, provided the means of maintaining life and inflicting death. They were the lifeblood of the resistance.

As long as this lifeblood flows, a guerrilla movement can be a nightmare to an occupying power. No occupying army can afford to commit much more than one soldier to every 80 conquered civilians. Assume that the 80 hate the 1. What happens when the 80 are armed? This is a question which should send shivers up the spine of any world conqueror.

The plane, the parachute, and the radio make it possible to arm the 80. But, as we have seen, arming the 80 requires the most careful and complex organization. Belatedly and haphazardly, the United States and Great Britain did create such an organization. The British, desperate for allies in the early days, were the first to sense the possibilities. They organized a resistance service which they called the Special Operations Executive. We followed suit with the Special Operations Branch of the Office of Strategic Services. SOE and SO-OSS dropped thousands of men into the resistance movements, and tens of thousands of tons of arms and explosives. The dividends they paid were startling.

But even during the war, the essentially political nature of guerrilla warfare was overlooked. The rule was that we supported anyone willing to kill Germans. The result has been that Communist guerrillas from Indochina to Greece were armed with British and American weapons, while in western Europe the Communists have cached great stocks of our weapons against the day when the Kremlin orders direct action.

Since the war, moreover, the new idea—the idea of arming the conquered against the conquerors—has been all but forgotten. We are not prepared, either in war or in so-called peace, to exploit the rage and despair of the masses of the people within the great new Soviet empire.

Now consider the other side of the picture. Some months ago Nicolai Bulganin, former Soviet war minister and one of the most powerful members of the Politburo, boasted rather smugly that the Soivet Union now possessed "an entirely novel doctrine of warfare." This doctrine is squarely based on guerrilla fighting. And Bulganin pointed out—as quoted in F. O. Miksche's interesting book, Secret Forces—that the new doctrine could be used to gain the Kremlin's ends "without resort to regular army warfare." In fact, the "novel doctrine" has been so used all over the world since the last war—in Greece, for example, and in Burma, in Malaya, in Indochina, in the Philippines and in China itself. We have fair warning that it is is going to be used in Korea.

The history of this novel doctrine, in fact, goes right back to that curious, neurotic, mid-nineteenth-century figure, Karl Marx.

Marx first evolved the theory of guerrilla war as an instrument of revolutionary power, and christened his theory "the people's war." He noted the essential fact about guerrilla fighting—that there is no means of striking at the roots of a combination of this kind.

Nicolai Lenin elaborated the theory of the people's war in a number of studies which now form an important part of Communist holy writ. Lenin concluded: "Marxism recognizes the inevitability of new forms of struggle as social conditions change. * * * Guerrilla warfare is the inevitable form of struggle when the mass movement has reached the stage of rebellion."

The people's war theories of Marx and Lenin were thoroughly battle-tested, with striking success, in the Russian revolution and the civil war which followed. Lenin's successor did not forget the lessons which Marx and Lenin had taught. On June 22, 1941, Adolf Hitler ordered the attack on Nazi Germany's erstwhile ally, the Soviet Union. On July 3 Josef Stalin gave the following order to the Russian people:

"In areas occupied by the enemy, guerrilla units, mounted and on foot, must be formed; diversionist groups must be organized to combat enemy troops, to foment guerrilla warfare everywhere, to blow up bridges and roads, to damage telephone and telegraph lines, to set fire to forests, stores, and transports. In the occupied areas conditions must be made unbearable for the enemy and all his accomplices. They must be bombed and annihilated at every step and all their measures frustrated."

Hitler joyfully interpreted this order as a confession of Stalin's despair. It was nothing of the sort. It reflected a military and political strategy which had been carefully elaborated long before Hitler's attack.

As long ago as 1933, in a partisan directive of that year, the Kremlin ordered theoretical study of guerrilla warfare and training in the guerrilla art. By 1934 Stalin was already warning the bourgeois states against making war on the Soviet Union: "It would be a most dangerous war for the bourgeois, for the reason that it would be waged not only at the front but behind the front lines." And by 1941, when the Nazis struck, the Kremlin was ready or so the Kremlin thought.

A central staff of the partisan movement had been created, enjoying separate and equal status with the supreme command of the Red army. An elaborate chain of command was prepared on both sides of the front, through the chief of the partisan staff, General Ponomarenko, up through Secret Police Chief Lavrenti Beria to Stalin himself.

Thousands of specialists in guerrilla warfare, trained before the war, were ready. So was a complex system of communication and supply, also organized before the war.

Then Stalin and the Politburo received an unpleasant surprise. Nothing happened when Stalin gave the order above quoted. The reason nothing happened is deeply significant. German combat commanders generally followed a policy of leaving the Russian people to their own devices. Churches were reopened, the collective-farm system broken up. As a result, almost everywhere in Russia the Germans at first were greeted with bread and salt, the traditional symbols of welcome. Festivals and folk dances were arranged for the amusement of the German troops, and hundreds of thousands of young Russians volunteered to join the invading armies.

Then, as the regular armies fought their way east, the Gestapo took over, and ran the occupied territories in strict accordance with Hitler's theory that Russians were an inferior race, fit only to be slaves. Beria's secret police and Ponomarenko's partisan command were thus enabled to retrieve the situation. Agents were sent into occupied territory with orders to commit atrocities against the Germans. The Gestapo, in reprisal, burned villages, and tortured and hanged hostages. For the first time, a fierce hatred of the Germans was born, and with it a guerrilla movement supported by the people. The Germans retaliated with ever-mounting brutality * * * and more Russians joined the guerrillas.

Even so, it was not until a full year after the invasion that Stalin's careful preparations for guerrilla warfare began to bear real fruit. But by 1943 great areas of occupied Russia were under partisan control, especially in the vast stretches of central Russia, where endless marshes and forests provide ideal guerrilla cover. Ponomarenko's partisan command maintained a fleet of planes—mostly American C-47's—which not only supplied the guerrillas with weapons but even flew out crops grown under guerrilla control to feed the besieged populations of Moscow and Leningrad.

The measures taken by Stalin and Beria to insure against the partisans' turning against the Kremlin itself are also significant. Political commissars were flown in to suppress all evidence of independent political thinking among the guerrillas. The discipline was ferocious. Here are a couple of random examples—from an article in the Infantry Journal—of how the guerrillas were kept under control:

"MAY 11, 1943.—Repeated licentiousness in dealing with women has caused pregnancy in seven cases. These women are a bother. Shoot them."

"SEPTEMBER 22, 1943.—Platoon leader Lukjnov extorted brandy and caroused with his platoon. Shoot him."

Whether in spite of or because of this ruthlessness, the Russian partisan movement grew from a thorn in Hitler's side until it became a dagger in his heart. In a single night, for example, on the front of the Third Panzer Division before Moscow, Russian guerrillas completed 15,000 separate road and rail demolitions. That night's work resulted in the collapse of the whole German communications network in the Moscow area, and made possible the first great Russian break-through.

By 1943, according to evidence in the files of the defense department, Russian partisans were tying down no less than 100,000 German combat troops in German Army group center alone. And the supply problem became almost insuperable. Great stretches of road and rail had to be abandoned by the Germans. By 1944, even hundreds of miles behind the front, it was necessary to armorplate all German supply trucks.

It is no wonder that the authoritative Infantry Journal, after a careful study of Russian guerrilla warfare, concluded that the Russian partisans gave Stalin the necessary margin of victory. Herr Goebbels, Hitler's brilliant, vicious little propaganda minister, said shortly before his death that the greatest single German mistake of the war was the failure to deal adequately with the Russian guerrilla resistance. Hitler himself paid his final respects to the Russian partisans, and to the other guerrillas who had harried and badgered his Wehrmacht, when he tried to form his own guerrilla movement, the Werewolves. Because the war was already lost, the German people had no hope of victory, and the attempt failed miserably.

So much for Europe and the war. The Kremlin successfully exploited the fourth dimention of modern war, the dimension of the war behind the lines, despite the initial almost universal disloyalty of the Russian people. The Kremlin's success derived from the fact that the Soviet leaders thoroughly understood the nature of guerrilla war, and were thoroughly prepared beforehand. By contrast, we entered the war with no understanding at all of the military possibilities of guerrilla fighting or of its political meaning. We nevertheless accomplished a great deal * * * but belatedly, and almost by accident.

Now let us turn to Asia. The Japanese encountered almost as much trouble from guerrillas as Hitler did during the war. But what is really meaningful is what has happened in Asia since the war.

In 1937 Mao Tse-tung wrote a remarkable treatise on guerrilla warfare, from which we have already quoted. This treatise, the bible of the Asiatic Communists, is almost unknown in the West—only one English translation, by a coauthor of this article, Colonel Griffith, exists. Mao concluded this treatise with a warning:

"Historical experience is written in blood and iron. We must point out that the guerrilla campaigns being waged in China today are a page in history that has no precedent. Their influence will not be confined solely to China but will be world-wide."

When Mao Tse-tung wrote these words he commanded a Communist guerrilla army which the Japanese regarded as an essentially unimportant collection of tattered bandits. Mao Tse-tung now rules a nation of 460,000,000 people. And he is the chief architect of a strategy designed to repeat the Communist triumph in China all over Asia.

There is no mystery about this. Mao Tse-tung's strategy was spelled out in detail for the benefit of Communist leaders from every country in Asia at a meeting in December 1949 in Peiping. A number of Russian Communists were present. But the Chinese, rather than the Russians, dominated the conference. They laid down the strategy.

The meeting was entirely businesslike. Just as an insurance salesman rates his prospects, so all the countries of Asia were rated according to their vulnerability.

Three countries—Mongolia, China, and North Korea—were already safely in Communist hands. They were assigned the role of forming a firm base in the drive for power. Six countries were designated ripe prospects for immediate conquest—South Korea, Indochina, Siam, Malaya, Indonesia, and the Philippines, in that order. Seven countries were designated unripe at present—Iran, Pakistan, India, Australia, Ceylon, Japan, and—rather surprisingly—Burma. In these countries a preliminary softening-up process is to continue for a time.

The technique of conquest is to be patterned precisely on the technique employed by Mao Tse-tung in the capture of China. It is squarely based on guerrilla war.

Mao Tse-tung has basically revised the theory of the People's War, sired so long ago by Karl Marx. All students of guerrilla war, including at one time Mao Tse-tung himself, have believed in the past that guerrillas can never by themselves win through to final victory; they can only be a complement to regular forces fighting at the front. But Mao Tse-tung proved in China that guerrillas, given the support of a great power and given moderate techniques of communication and supply, can themselves be gradually transformed into regular forces. They can then win total victory.

This is, of course, precisely what happened in China, with the Soviet Union cast in the role of the supporting power. The Communist guerrillas in Indochina have now reached the stage of being transformed into regular forces, with China as the supporting power. According to the Communist strategy laid down in Peiping, this sequence of events is to be repeated throughout Asia, until all Asia is Communist-ruled.

The Peiping strategy is continuing on schedule. Korea is now obviously the major target. But Indochina also is in desperate danger, and 150,000 good French troops are tied down there. Some 90,000 British and Malayan troops are dealing none too successfully with a few thousand Communist guerrillas in Malaya. Unless we very soon understand what is going on and take determined measures to deal with it, all Asia will be lost.

How do you deal with guerrillas? First, there is one way not to deal with them. This is by a campaign of retaliatory terror directed against the civilian population. Innumerable military commanders, from Nepoleon through Hitler, have tried the technique of terror. It may lead to a surface calm, a deathly stillness, for a time. But in the end it is always fatal. With mathematical certainty, the guerrillas are in the end enormously strengthened by the hatred of the survivors.

There are certain purely military techniques for dealing with guerrillas. The German generals in Russia, toward the end of the war, created special antipartisan forces, called Jagd-Kommandos. These were lightly but powerfully equipped columns, manned by elite troops, extremely mobile, with an elaborate communications network and with plenty of aircraft for transportation, observation, and support. By the time the Jagd-Kommandos came into existence, it was already too late. But the Germans were on the right track. This sort of specially trained mobile force can do much to seal off guerrillas from their bases of supply and to keep them on the run.

Yet one fact cannot be emphasized too much—there is no purely military solution whatsoever to the problem posed by modern guerrilla warfare. Military strength is an essential component. But the only final solution is a political solution.

"Guerrillas," Mao Tse-tung wrote, "are like fish, and the people are the water in which the fish swim. If the temperature of the water is right the fish will multiply and flourish."

We and our allies in Asia and Europe must control the temperature of the water in which the Communist fish are swimming. This is what we did in the two nations—Greece and Indonesia—where Communist guerrilla movements have met with total defeat. We controlled the "temperature of the water" in Greece by backing the Greek Government with military and economic aid. We controlled it in Indonesia by supporting the fight of the Indonesian leaders for independence.

This suggests the nature of an effective defense against Mao Tse-tung's strategy of conquest. Military strength is deeply important, and nowhere on earth is military strength more respected than in Asia. But we must also replace the false revolutionary appeal of communism in Asia by a revolutionary appeal of our own—for the situation almost everywhere in Asia is intrinsically revolutionary.

This cannot be done by futile mouthings about "our way of life"—they mean precisely nothing at all to Asiatics. It can be done only by offering the two things Asia wants above all—national independence and a level of life somewhat above the animal—and by being prepared to deliver on the offer.

But defense is never enough. It is not enough merely to attempt to control the "temperature of the water" in the threatened areas of the non-Communist world. We must have fish of our own, capable of swimming in Communist waters. We must support, arm, and even help to create—quite openly if need be—guerrilla movements within the vast new Soviet empire of tyranny.

It will be said that guerrillas cannot operate successfully within a ruthless totalitarian state. This is nonsense. A totalitarian state is totalitarian only because it possesses a monopoly of power—and power, in the last analysis, means guns. Put guns into the hands of the enemies of the state, and the monopoly is broken.

It will also be said that the Kremlin will go to war in response to so direct a challenge to its authority. This, too, is nonsense. No sane man doubts the identity of the power which has armed and supported the Communist guerrillas in Greece, for example, or Korea, or China itself. A boxer fighting according to the Marquis of Queensberry rules cannot long survive against a thug with a shiv. If we are to survive, we must be prepared to use the shiv.

And the opportunity is there. It is greater, perhaps, than any of us realize. Remember the bread and salt with which the Russian people at first greeted the German invaders. Remember the thousands of Russians and eastern Europeans who preferred death to repatriation to their homelands. Remember the tens of thousands who have risked death to escape since the war. The rage and despair of the people in the satellite states and in the Soviet Union itself are the ideal raw material of resistance.

Chou En-lai is himself the authority for the statement that today there are no fewer than 250,000 bandits in China—bandits is the word always used by those in authority to describe hostile guerrillas. Let us support these bandits, just as the Soviets supported Chou En-lai and Mao Tse-tung when they were bandits. Let us support other bandits, especially where there is a common frontier between Soviet empire and the west—in Eastern Germany, in Poland, in Czechoslovakia, in Bulgaria.

To do this will require an elaborate organization, staffed by professionals who thoroughly understand both the political impact of guerrilla fighting and modern techniques for supporting guerrillas. There is already the nucleus for such an organization in the Central Intelligence Agency. But it must be very greatly expanded if the opportunity to turn the two-edged sword of guerrilla warfare against the Kremlin is to be efficiently exploited.

Make no mistake about it, the men in the Kremlin are fully aware of the fact that guerrilla warfare is a two-edged sword. In 1919 anti-Bolshevik guerrilla bands were organized in the Ukraine. When he learned of this, there was something very like hysteria in the reaction of the usually icy Lenin.

"We must dread these guerrilla tendencies!" Lenin shouted at his fellow Bolsheviks. "We must dread them like fire, or they will lead to our destruction!"

Lenin's successor is quite aware of the deadly hatred for his regime which underlies the carefully organized adulation for "the great comrade Stalin." He, too, must dread "guerrilla tendencies" like fire. For they could lead to his destruction.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, the insertions to which I had reference are as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIP WILL TAKE STEEL PLATES TO MAO

HONG KONG, December 4.—The Isbrandtsen Steamship Co. of New York plans to send its ship Flying Clipper from Hong Kong to Communist China tomorrow, carrying a cargo of steel plate and cotton.

The line's agents, Pattison & Co., said the ship would sail as scheduled despite the fact several crew members refused to sail to the Communist port of Tsingtao.

The American consulate said the crew members visited the consulate Friday shortly after the arrival of the Flying Clipper to determine whether they had any grounds to leave the ship.

The consulate pointed out to them that they had signed articles for the entire trip in New York, even though they knew it would call at Tsingtao.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR O'CONOR

It is gratifying to be able to report to the Senate that, after the extensive investigation by the Senate Subcommittee on Maritime Matters, it has been announced that strict controls will hereafter be applied—effective last midnight—on all shipments destined for Communist China, Hong Kong, and Macao.

This action is in line with the requests made by us to the Office of International Trade and is in accord with the public demand which I made on the Senate floor last week at the time of introducing Senate Resolution 365 for an all-out investigation pertaining to shipments to Communist-dominated areas.

While we hail the action taken by the Commerce Department, it is to be regretted that it has been so long delayed. The Communists have been in control of China for over 14 months and the United States fighting forces have been engaged in deadly combat with the Communists in Korea since last June. It is, therefore, more than surprising that it is not until December of 1950 that these materials, which can unquestionably be put to strategic uses in the building of the industrial potential of the Communists, are now brought under controls.

An important fact to be stressed is that the mere application of control procedure does not mean that the United States is going to prohibit the transportation of possible strategic supplies to China. What we demand is that there be no licenses issued for anything which can help the military potential of our avowed enemy.

Of great importance is the announcement that the new regulations will apply to transshipments of strategic materials originating in foreign countries and passing through United States ports. Our subcommittee high-lighted this as a glaring loophole in the preexisting system which allowed sizable shipments of strategic goods to reach Communist hands.

I mention in this regard boiler tubes from Germany, silicon steel plates from several countries of western Europe, copper from Japan, and other items which we definitely have established were purchased in those countries by American companies for the express purpose of shipping to Communist consignees.

The hearings of our subcommittee brought out clearly that certain products were being permitted to go to Communist China as nonstrategic which common sense tells us are highly strategic. On this point the Commerce Department has come to agree with the subcommittee with relation, for instance, to such items as petrolatum, certain types of sheet steel, and penicillin and other medicines.

In penicillin alone it was ascertained that tons of this vital antibiotic have been flown to Communist China since the opening of hostilities in Korea. Yet the Department did not place it on the restricted list until November 16. From the huge amounts shipped, it would seem likely that Communist forces have a large enough quantity of penicillin necessary to keep their fighting forces in condition to murder our fighting men, and they got this penicillin right from our own country.

While agreeing that the action of the Department in restricting all direct shipments to Communist China is a step forward, let me emphasize that this action does not cover a very great source of help to the Communist countries with which our subcommittee has been concerning itself likewise. This is the question of strategic items which go from our allies, from foreign countries which are being furnished American financial and other assistance in great quantities and which, nevertheless, are continually dealing with and supplying our Communist enemies with items highly necessary to the conduct of their war against United Nations forces.

This entire matter of export controls must be gone into very thoroughly. It was for this reason that I introduced last week a resolution asking for Senate authority to broaden the investigation into export regulations and policies. For weeks United States representatives in Europe have been meeting with representatives of our European allies regarding the matter of trade with Communist countries. It is an open fact, however, that despite these efforts such countries as England, Belgium, France, and others are sending to Communist Russia and her satellite countries the most highly strategic materials and products, including copper, steel, machine tools, automobiles, and other transportation equipment. Only last week Belgium effected a trade agreement to send large quantities of copper and steel products to Russia in exchange for wheat and certain Russian products.

The American people demand that our officials act in protecting United States interests and prevent continuation of the shipments of any items which our enemies need badly for their war upon us. It is high time that effective steps be taken to close the many doors through which these strategic materials have been getting to our enemies.

While it is apparent that the executive branch now has taken definite steps to tighten our controls of strategic materials to Red China and other Communist-dominated areas, it is quite apparent that these steps would not have been taken had not the Congress, through its investigation, emphasized the need for such action.

Because of the great importance of strengthening our control program at all levels at this time, I believe that both the executive and the legislative branch should continue to examine thoroughly the entire program.

ACHESON MUST GO

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, never before in the history of the Republic have our people faced such a critical period. Today our Army in North Korea is being overwhelmed. It is a time for plain speaking.

Never before has our need been greater for a Secretary of State capable of making wise, sound, consistent decisions. Have we such a Secretary of State today? The record will give the answer.

MR. ACHESON AND MR. HISS

At the outset of his diplomatic career, Mr. Acheson associated himself with a group of men who believed in what they were pleased to call the great design. This was no more nor less than the appeasement of Russia. This plan of giving Stalin everything he asked for has proved a failure—a tragic failure. Mr. Acheson has never been able to rid himself of remnants of either his early point of view or his long-time association.

In 1939, before Alger Hiss did his deeds of shame at Yalta, Dean Acheson stated, "Don't investigate Hiss, I will vouch for him completely." Mr. Acheson kept Hiss, retained him in top jobs in the State Department and finally brought about his appointment as head of the United Nations Convention in San Francisco.

Mr. Acheson sent Hiss to Yalta. There Hiss and Gromyko drafted the Yalta agreement. Arthur Bliss Lane, our American Ambassador to Poland, said of this agreement. "As I glanced over the document I could not believe my eyes. To me almost every line spoke of a surrender to Stalin."

It was Mr. Acheson who said, "I will not turn my back on Alger Hiss," after Hiss had been convicted for his activities in connection with the delivery of State Department secrets to a man named as an espionage agent.

I wonder what the American boys fighting for their lives on the icy slopes of North Korea think of this beautiful relationship. What a somber spectacle confronts us today—our soldiers fighting against overwhelming Red forces—our State Department, guided by a man, for a long time identified with a policy, the inevitable result of which was to strengthen the power of the Soviet Union.

MR. ACHESON ZIGZAGGED US INTO WAR

Under Mr. Acheson, the United States cannot be said to have a foreign policy. We have had a whole series of policies, each differing from the other, in essential particulars.

The Acheson foreign policy of December 1950 is not the Acheson policy of 1949. It is not even the Acheson policy of May 1950. Inconsistencies of action and opinion may sometimes be justified when they arise from changing circumstances. But what has been described as our foreign policy under Mr. Acheson has consisted of nothing more nor less than a series of wavering, spur-of-the-moment pronouncements, most of which were exactly what the Reds anticipated and desired. Mr. Acheson zigged, and he zagged, until he zigzagged us into war.

On February 24, 1949, Mr. Acheson said that it was the policy of the administration to wait until the dust settled in China. The administration waited. When the dust had settled, the Reds had grabbed all China except Formosa. Thereupon Acheson announced: "A new day has dawned in Asia." Then the State Department sent a secret memorandum to its representatives in the Far East saying that it would accomplish no material good to send naval units to Formosa and that the loss of the island was widely anticipated.

On January 12 of this year, Mr. Acheson warned against what he called "foolish adventures" in the Far East, such as intervention on Formosa. At that time he drew a line through Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines and said we would defend them against attack. But he gave no such assurance as to Korea or Formosa or southern Asia.

This statement by Mr. Acheson must have been interpreted by Stalin as an invitation to attack. The Reds had a right to believe that they had a free pass into Korea.

When the Reds made their attack in Korea, the State Department hastily reversed itself. The decision to defend Korea and to send the Navy to protect Formosa represented a complete about-face—a complete repudiation of Mr. Acheson's program and policy. If Mr. Acheson had drawn the line in South Korea and warned that we would defend it—as we are defending it now—we probably would not be fighting there today.

MR. ACHESON TIED GENERAL MAC ARTHUR'S HANDS

After having blundered into war, the least Mr. Acheson could have done was to give General MacArthur and his gallant troops a free hand, as the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] said. Mr. Acheson has not done this. Instead, at his behest the hands of General MacArthur have been tied. Our fighting men have been forbidden to strike across the Korean border at the Chinese Communists. Mr. Acheson has created a vacuum—a sanctuary for Red troops—behind the Yalu River, where they are free from attack in their assembly areas in Manchuria.

In an interview last Saturday, General MacArthur described this as "an enormous handicap, without precedent in military history." Officers on General MacArthur's staff have stated flatly that it would be impossible to fight the war while the enemy had "protected bases across an inviolate frontier."

This sanctuary is not the creation of the United Nations. It is the brain child of our State Department. According to an Associated Press article in the New York Times for December 2, "highly placed administrative sources in Washington said it was the United States Government rather than the United Nations that had forbidden General MacArthur to send troops or bombers across the Korean border to smash at strategic targets in Red China."

There are, Mr. President, and always will be doubts in my mind as to the wisdom of the President's action in sending, without the authority of the Congress, American forces into Korea. But since we have resorted to the sword in Korea, we should swing it with all the force at our command. We must not force our boys to fight with one arm tied behind their backs. As the Dallas News has sagely commented: "War is no game for handicaps."

HOW LONG MUST WE WAIT?

Mr. President, how long must we wait? How long can one be as wrong as the present Secretary of State has been, and still continue in that high office, the wise conduct of which means so much for the peace of the world?

The boys who are fighting and dying in Korea—their mothers and fathers and friends, all of us—deserve a prompt and satisfactory answer. The public is demanding a decisive answer. And the only answer that will meet with public acceptance is a thorough house cleaning of the State Department, set off by the departure of Mr. Acheson.

MISSOURIANS EXPRESS THEIR VIEWS

Last Wednesday Secretary Acheson, in an effort to justify his position, took to the air to address the American people. He gave voice to a number of studied and pious platitudes, accompanied by much waving of his index finger. Following that address, the mail coming into Washington demanding the removal of Mr. Acheson was expected in official circles to drop off. So far as my office is concerned it has increase in volume and in violence. I have not received a single letter expressing approval of the Secretary's speech.

Let me read a few excerpts from some of the letters on this subject. I am confident that every Member of the Senate has received letters to the same effect. I shall, therefore, recite only a few extracts. Here is the reaction in the State of Missouri:

A telegram from Kansas City states:

It is inconceivable that our Nation is as bankrupt of leadership as has been exemplified by the address of Dean Acheson. It is time our Government is cleansed of him and his clan before it is too late.

Another telegram from the same city asks:

Why don't you get rid of Acheson and his gang before it is too late?

A Kirksville woman writes:

I listened to the speech of the Secretary of State. He didn't tell us anything we didn't already know, and I'm sick and tired of that whole mess from him down to the office cat. I know the records have been cleaned out but isn't there some way to clean out the people, too!

A woman from Kansas City says:

In the name of God do something to get Acheson and his Communist clique out of our Government.

"In the name of God do something." she says. She does not speak irreverently. This comes from the heart of a good, God-fearing woman.

From Kirksville a man and his wife write:

The past 5 years of appeasement of Russia by Acheson and his party is showing up more and more every day. And this appeasement is the cause of our American boys being killed on the far-away battlefields today.

It is time Acheson and his entire gang was kicked out. Why fight Communists thousands of miles away and protect them at home, and especially in our Government.

The American people are getting pretty tired of this kind of stuff.

A man from the President's home town of Independence writes:

Please work hard toward getting a new State Department—a strong, fighting one. Acheson should go immediately.

A Kansas City student now doing graduate work at the University of South Dakota writes me from Vermillion:

It is my opinion that Secretary of State Acheson should be removed from office immediately and all of his fellow travelers. A thorough house cleaning in the State Department should take place and no holds barred. Whether the man be Democrat or Republican, if he is an Acheson man or Communist sympathizer he should be removed.

And a housewife says simply:

Fire Acheson.

A telegram from a leading Kansas City lawyer states:

There is a growing demand for a clean-up in the State Department and for strong, forceful leadership in time of crisis.

A woman writes from Carthage:

Is there no way that this Nation can be freed from the muddling and fumbling of the Communist appeasers like Dean Acheson in our Government?

From Joplin a housewife says:

I am writing to urge you as a Member of Congress to use all your power to cause a complete and absolute change in our State Department policy and personnel.

THE PEOPLE WANT A SECRETARY OF STATE LIKE TAFT OR BYRD

From Richmond Heights comes this:

The situation in Korea demands that Congress clean out the State Department and replace Acheson with a man of the caliber of BYRD or TAFT.

There we have it. The thinking people of this country eagerly desire a Secretary of State of seasoned judgment and practical common sense like ROBERT A. TAFT or HARRY F. BYRD.

Our country is in peril. We shrink from thinking of the results of a continuation of the present trend. It is said that we are already in world war two and a half. Perhaps it is too late to avert the catastrophe of a third world war. I do not know. But I do know that as the elected, the trusted representatives of the American people, we in the Congress have a bounden duty to do everything in our power to save the world from this appalling ruin.

We must not only reexamine our foreign policy which brought us to the brink of this catastrophe, we must reconsider, replace and reconstruct it. It must be brought down to earth. Our commitments must be geared to our capacity to fulfill them. The so-called Truman doctrine must be redefined. The first step is to engage the services of a Secretary of State whose inclination and record will inspire faith in his ability to do the job as the American people want it done. Only a completely new, anti-Red State Department will be able to guide the United States through this crisis. President Truman has said that Mr. Acheson is assured "of a place of preeminence among the greatest of our Secretaries of State." If so, the American people are quite content that Mr. Acheson now retire on his laurels. This is the first and a necessary step in the rehabilitation of our foreign policy. It is time to call forward for duty the best that we have.

On February 6 last I made a public statement in which I said, "If Acheson does not resign, the President should remove him." Subsequent developments have strengthened this conviction to the point where I now feel that if Mr. Acheson does not resign, or is not removed, drastic steps to force his removal may be in order.

Unless positive steps are taken, and at once, by the administration to bring about the removal of Secretary Acheson and a thorough house cleaning in the State Department, the Congress of the United States should take whatever steps are required to bring about these results.

And so I say, Acheson must go.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, as I understand, it was the intention of the majority leader to proceed with the rent-control joint resolution after several distinguished Senators had completed their remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from South Carolina that the rent-control joint resolution is the unfinished business.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, there are several committee meetings in progress. The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] desired to be heard. He told me that he was to address the Municipal League today at 12 o'clock, but that he would return to the Senate Chamber by 2. I have assured my good friend the acting minority leader [Mr. SALTONSTALL], as well as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], the minority leader, that the Senator from Washington would have an opportunity to be heard. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum, so that Senators may have an opportunity to reach the Chamber. If the Senator from Washington does not return, I shall speak briefly upon the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hoey	Mundt
Anderson	Holland	Neely
Bricker	Hunt	Nixon
Butler	Ives	O'Conor
Byrd	Johnson, Tex.	Pepper
Cain	Johnston, S. C.	Robertson
Capehart	Kefauver	Russell
Carlson	Kem	Saltonstall
Chapman	Kerr	Schoeppel
Chavez	Kilgore	Smith, Maine
Clements	Knowland	Smith, N. C.
Connally	Langer	Smith, N. J.
Cordon	Leahy	Stennis
Donnell	Lehman	Taft
Dworshak	Long	Taylor
Eastland	Lucas	Thomas, Okla.
Ecton	McCarthy	Thomas, Utah
Frear	McClellan	Thye
Fulbright	McFarland	Tydings
George	McKellar	Watkins
Gillette	McMahon	Wherry
Gurney	Magnuson	Wiley
Hayden	Malone	Williams
Hendrickson	Maybank	Young
Hickenlooper	Millikin
Hill	Morse

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLEMENTS in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, the unfinished business is the joint resolution extending rent control for some 60 days, so that the new Congress may or may not write a new rent-control bill when it meets in January.

Three days ago I spoke extensively on the subject of the joint resolution. I understand that other Senators wish to speak on that question, and I wish to make a few additional remarks.

The acting minority leader suggested to me that he would like to make a speech on the subject. The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], who wishes to speak on this question, has not yet returned to the Chamber. I assured him that I would do nothing in respect to having the Senate act on the measure until he had a chance to speak.

So I shall yield to the acting minority leader, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], if that is agreeable.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator. I have a brief speech, requiring perhaps 30 seconds, which I should like to make on this subject, either at this time or at a later time, whichever is more convenient. I shall speak either in the time of the Senator from South Carolina or in my own time.

I have checked with the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], and I understand that he will be in the Chamber in a few minutes.

Mr. MAYBANK. I did not check with the Senator from Washington, because I was sure the acting minority leader would do so. The Senator from Washington told me that he wished to make a speech which would require perhaps half an hour.

At this time I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he wishes to have me do so.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I shall be glad to have the Senator yield to me now, to permit me to make a brief statement on this question.

Mr. MAYBANK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, at the election on November 7 there was the following question on the ballot in Massachusetts:

Shall a declaration be made by popular referendum, pursuant to the Housing and Rent Act of 1950, that a shortage of rental housing accommodations exists which requires the continuance of Federal rent control in this city (or town) after December 31, 1950, and until the close of June 30, 1951, in accordance with the provisions of said act?

In Massachusetts there are 39 cities and 312 towns. The question was not on the ballot in 49 towns. All the 39 cities and all but 34 of the towns which participated in the referendum voted in the affirmative. All of these 34 towns are small. Inasmuch as the registered voters in the cities number 1,616,101 persons and the registered voters in the 312 towns number 868,837, an overwhelming majority of the people of Massachusetts wish this act continued in their localities until June 30, 1951.

I shall support the joint resolution.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President——

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I did not know that the Senator from Tennessee wished to be recognized.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], who is a member of the committee, asked me whether he would be able to make a brief statement at this time, without causing me to lose my right to the floor. I ask unanimous consent that, without losing my right to the floor, the Senator from Ohio may speak at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] desires to be recognized in order to submit a privileged resolution, if that is agreeable to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BRICKER. Certainly; I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

ARREST OF WITNESSES WHOSE TESTIMONY IS REQUIRED BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE INTERSTATE CRIME

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, from the Special Committee To Investigate Crime in Interstate Commerce, I report a resolution and submit a report (No. 2586) thereon. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be acted upon at this time.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I would have to object to any unanimous-consent agreement, because I have assured the Senator from Ohio that he can speak at this time.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not think there is any controversy about this matter.

Mr. MAYBANK. If there is no controversy, I am willing to agree to the Senator's request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 368) was read, as follows:

Whereas the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce has reported to the Senate that subpenas have been issued for certain persons named in the body of this resolution, and that these persons are important witnesses necessary to the investigation being conducted by that committee pursuant to Senate Resolution 202, Eighty-first Congress, second session, and that the said persons have not been located despite diligent search, and that the committee has reasonable cause to believe that the said persons will not appear in response to subpenas but will continue in hiding to avoid appearance before the committee; and

Whereas the appearance and testimony of the witnesses named in the body of this resolution is material and necessary in order that the committee may properly execute the functions assigned to it and may obtain information necessary as a basis for legislation: It is therefore

Resolved, That the President of the Senate issue his warrants commanding the Sergeant at Arms or such persons as may be deputized by him to take into custody the bodies of: Anthony "Tony" Accardo, alias Joe Batters; Patrick James Burns; Murray Llewellyn Humphreys; Rocco Fischetti, alias Ralph Fisher; Charles Fischetti, alias Charles Fisher, Dr. Charles Fisher, Charles Brown, and Ralph Fields; Joseph Sica; Martin M. Hartman; Ben Marden; John Patton; Elmer (Bones) Remmer; Morris Rosen wherever found, and to bring the said persons before the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce in Washington, D. C., then and there to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the said special committee shall propound;

That, for the purpose of executing warrants issued in accordance with this resolution, the Sergeant at Arms may, by blanket order or orders, deputize all law enforcement officers of the Federal Government; and

That the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce may discharge any of the persons taken into custody under authority of this resolution upon proper assurance, by recognizance or otherwise, that he will appear for interrogation when required. The committee may require such assurance as it deems necessary not to exceed $25,000 for any one witness.

For the purpose of discharging any person from custody and ordering assurances, one member of the said committee shall be a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that it seems to me that the resolution is rather important. I do not recall that such a resolution has come before the Senate since I have been a Member. I think we should have a quorum call before we act on the resolution. Therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. AIKEN answered to his name when called.

Mr MAYBANK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. MAYBANK. I merely wish to inquire whether, after a quorum is obtained, I shall still have the right to the floor, in view of the agreement under which I yielded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Tennessee is pending.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will proceed with the call of the roll.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hoey	Mundt
Anderson	Holland	Neely
Bricker	Hunt	Nixon
Butler	Ives	O'Conor
Byrd	Johnson, Tex.	Pepper
Cain	Johnston, S. C.	Robertson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. LUCAS and Mr. KEFAUVER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. LUCAS. What is the business before the Senate at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has requested unanimous consent for consideration of the resolution which has been read by the clerk.

Mr. LUCAS. If agreed to will that displace the rent-control measure?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would hold that it is a privileged matter. It would not change the status with respect to the consideration of the joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 207.

Mr. LUCAS. I have not had occasion to examine the document which has been submitted. It seems to me to be very far reaching and to involve serious considerations. I think it ought to lie over, or at least be referred to some committee. It ought at least to be given some consideration. I presume there is precedent for the resolution, but there is some doubt in my mind as to whether it is proper at this particular time to present it, in view of what is stated in the resolution itself.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I may say respectfully to the Senator from Illinois that I understand from those at the desk that the resolution is without precedent. It is in different form from resolutions offered in ordinary contempt proceedings. I therefore feel that the resolution should not be laid over, but should be referred to a committee, which I assume would be the Committee on Rules and Administration. If the committee considers it a proper matter, it will report it promptly no doubt. But if it might establish a precedent, as it would, according to my understanding, then we should not proceed to establish the precedent without at least giving a committee a chance to consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to refer the resolution would be in order.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator has asked unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. I shall object to that at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. A motion to refer the resolution to a committee is still in order.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I move that the Senate proceed immediately to consider the resolution, which has been reported.

Mr. LUCAS. As a substitute for that motion, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for further consideration.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the substitute motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the point.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The resolution is a privileged one, reported by a select committee of the Senate in order to effectuate the work of that committee. The committee from which it is reported has jurisdiction of the resolution and has, by unanimous vote, reported the resolution to the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in reply, I submit if the Senator from Tennessee can make a motion, I have a right certainly, under the rules of the Senate to offer a substitute motion for the motion he has made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Illinois takes precedence over the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LUCAS. I desire to be heard for just a moment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not yield for that purpose, if I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I read from the resolution.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I made a point of order. Was the point of order acted upon? If so, what was the ruling of the Chair on the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LUCAS. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If the Senator is permitted to debate or explain his position on the motion to refer the resolution, does consideration of the motion automatically displace consideration of the rent-control joint resolution, which is now on the calendar, or is unanimous consent required for the Senator from Illinois to discuss his motion to refer the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only temporarily would consideration of the motion displace consideration of the rent-control bill.

Mr. LUCAS. The resolution reads:

Whereas the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce has reported to the Senate that subpenas have been issued for certain persons named in the body of this resolution, and that these persons are important witnesses necessary to the investigation being conducted by that committee pursuant to Senate Resolution 202, Eighty-first Congress, second session, and that the said persons have not been located despite diligent search, and that the committee has reasonable cause to believe that the said persons will not appear in response to subpenas but will continue in hiding to avoid appearance before the committee; and

Whereas the appearance and testimony of the witnesses named in the body of this resolution is material and necessary in order that the committee may properly execute the functions assigned to it and may obtain information necessary as a basis for legislation: It is therefore

Resolved, That the President of the Senate issue his warrants commanding the Sergeant at Arms or such persons as may be deputized by him to take into custody the bodies of—

Naming the persons—

wherever found, and to bring the said persons before the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce in Washington, D. C., then and there to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the said special committee shall propound—

And so forth. Mr. President, under the original power granted to it the committee was given the right to subpena witnesses whom the committee found necessary or advisable to subpena in the interest of carrying out the objectives of the resolution under which the committee was created.

The committee has been unable to find certain individuals. I do not know what power the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate has which the investigators of the committee do not have. The investigators have been diligent in their search. The committee has a good many employees available for the purpose of finding witnesses. I do not know how the Sergeant at Arms would be able to find witnesses any sooner than the committee's investigators.

I read from section 194 of the general and permanent laws relating to the Senate:

Whenever a witness summoned as mentioned in section 192 of this title fails to appear to testify or fails to produce any books, papers, records, or documents, as required, or whenever any witness so summoned refuses to anwer any question pertinent to the subject under inquiry before either House, or any joint committee established by a joint or concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, or any committee or subcommittee of either House of Congress, and the fact of such failure or failures is reported to either House while Congress is in session, or when Congress is not in session, a statement of fact constituting such failure is reported to and filed with the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, it shall be the duty of the said President of the Senate or Speaker of the House, as the case may be, to certify, and he shall so certify, the statement of facts aforesaid under the seal of the Senate or House, as the case may be, to the appropriate United States attorney, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for its action.

That is the only reference, I believe, which will be found in the rules with respect to what can be done by the President of the Senate.

Up to this time a witness has been summoned, but he has not been found. Therefore he has in fact not been summoned. Consequently, in my judgment—and this is only an off-the-cuff opinion—a very serious question exists whether or not the President of the Senate has the power to do what is requested. A further examination of the records may disclose that he may have such power, but certainly the importance of establishing a precedent of this kind in the Senate should be carefully weighed. I doubt very much—and it would be interesting to know—that all members of the committee agreed upon the resolution which is before us. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if that is so.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Were all committee members agreed on it?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Do the committee records show that fact?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. It is very interesting and I am glad to note that the committee has a record showing unanimous agreement on it. I return to the position I took a moment ago. If we are about to establish a new precedent, as has been indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts—and I have not had an opportunity to examine into that question—certainly no precedent should be established by the Senate based on snap judgment. It is a matter which should be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. We are dealing with a special committee of the Senate, which has no power other than to recommend legislation. A resolution dealing with the arrest of persons, particularly when the Senate has not been advised of it in advance, presents a very serious proposition. No time could be lost by referring the resolution to the committee, with a view of having the committee advise the Senate within a reasonable time exactly what the resolution means, how far it goes, and whether or not it is the proper action to take under the rules of the Senate and the laws of the country.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Do I understand that the Senator's motion specifically is to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary? I understand him to make the motion in the alternative with reference to the Committee on Rules and Administration and the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LUCAS. I think the Committee on the Judiciary is the proper committee to study the resolution, because the Committee on the Judiciary is composed of good lawyers, who are presumed to be able to examine into such a resolution and to report its opinion as to whether it would set a precedent, and whether it is correct and proper action to take. If it is a proper resolution, obviously I shall follow the opinion of the committee. At this time I do not wish to follow the opinion of the Senator from Tennessee and the committee which has reported the resolution, fresh and new as it is, and apparently without any precedent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee wish to be heard on the motion?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes, I do. The distinguished majority leader is incorrect in stating that this resolution would create a precedent or that the arrest of witnesses whose testimony is wanted by the Senate is new and unprecedented. There is precedent for exactly what this resolution calls for and in at least two cases these precedents have been tested by the Supreme Court which has unequivocally held that the Senate has power to arrest witnesses whose testimony it desires in pursuit of its function and that this power includes the arrest of witnesses whose testimony is sought by committees of the Senate. I refer to McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U. S. 135). In that case a select committee of the Senate was investigating the Teapot Dome scandal and as a part of that investigation it desired the testimony of the brother of Attorney General Daugherty. A subpena was served on Daugherty to appear and testify but he ignored it. The Senate then passed a resolution reciting that Daugherty's testimony was material and necessary in order that the committee properly execute the functions imposed upon it and it then resolved that the President of the Senate pro tempore issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of M. S. Daugherty wherever found and to bring the said M. S. Daugherty before the bar of the Senate then and there to answer such questions, and so forth. In other words the Senate resolved that the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy should arrest Daugherty and bring him before the Senate to answer questions. I might say that the resolution in the Daugherty case was used by committee counsel as a model in drafting the resolution we are now discussing. The Supreme Court unanimously held that this warrant of arrest was constitutional and otherwise lawful. Another precedent is Barry against United States ex rel. Cunningham, which is reported at Two Hundred and Seventy-ninth United States Reports, page 597. In that case Cunningham had testified before a special committee of the Senate investigative primary expenditures that he had contributed $50,000 to the primary campaign of William S. Vare, of Pennsylvania. He flatly refused, however, to tell where he had gotten the money. After the election Cunningham similarly refused to testify before the special committee. Thereafter Vare's election was contested. The special committee recommended to the Senate that Cunningham be cited for contempt, but instead the Senate resolved that a warrant should be issued commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to arrest Cunningham. The Court, in a unanimous opinion, held that the Senate had the power to issue this warrant. I will quote from this case at page 616:

> Third. The real question is not whether the Senate had power to issue the warrant of arrest, but whether it could do so under the circumstances disclosed by the record. The decision of the court of appeals is that, as a necessary prerequisite to the issue of a warrant of arrest, a subpena first should have been issued, served, and disobeyed. And undoubtedly the courts recognize this as the practice generally to be followed. But undoubtedly also, a court has power in the exercise of a sound discretion to issue a warrant of arrest without a previous subpena when there is good reason to believe that otherwise the witness will not be forthcoming.

In other words, Mr. President, these two decisions clearly hold that the Senate has the power to compel a witness to appear before it or before one of its committees and to give testimony and that it may do this by subpena or, if for some reason a subpena will prove ineffective, it may do so by the issuance of a warrant of arrest. The Senate has done it before and the Supreme Court has at least twice unequivocably upheld the action.

In that particular case the committee has carried over into the next Congress.

In that case practically the same issue was raised as is raised here, and the Court, by unanimous decision, held that the Senate did have the power to require the appearance of the witness before the committee which was conducting the investigation in that particular case, even though the committee was continuing over into another Congress.

The section which has been read by the distinguished majority leader, section 194 of the rules contained in the Reorganization Act, refers only to cases in which service has been secured. In such cases, section 194 provides that if a witness refuses to answer after he has been brought before a committee, if the Senate is in session a resolution may be presented to the Senate providing for instructions to the district attorney to prosecute him for contempt. But if the Senate is not in session, the resolution shall be presented to the Vice President, and he shall have the authority to certify the matter to the appropriate district attorney.

But that is just the point here. Service has not and cannot be effected because the witnesses are in hiding. Subpenas will not work and so we have to try something more effective.

In the present case the particular witnesses whose names have been listed are quite well known. Subpenas have been issued, and a long and diligent search has been made. Every effort has been made to serve subpenas on those witnesses. We have even gone so far as to have inquiry made among the neighbors, and in some cases of their wives, as to their whereabouts. Unquestionably they have purposely avoided—and that is the allegation in the committee's report—service of a subpena issued by a committee of the United States Senate.

Two of the witnesses were last heard of in Mexico, but they will be coming back. In this case the hope would be that the Sergeant at Arms would, in conformity with the resolution, call upon the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other Federal investigative agencies, such as the border patrol, to keep a lookout for them, and bring them before the committee to testify when they are located.

It is very difficult for the committee to do this kind of work when witnesses secrete themselves so that a subpena cannot be served upon them, even after the most diligent effort.

The work of this committee is about to come to an end. We are to make our report in the latter part of February. In order to get the necessary information and make a report to the Senate, we feel that it is highly important to have the testimony of these particular witnesses, who are key characters in some of the most important investigations which we are carrying on.

Mr. President, there are certain powers inherent in this body, and reiterated in the two cases to which I have referred. There is the general power to prevent anyone from ignoring the orders of the Senate. There is the power to compel witnesses to come before a committee to give testimony. To defer this matter and engage in extended hearings before the Judiciary Committee or some other committee, when the issue is quite clear, would give a great deal of encouragement to other persons upon whom we are trying to serve subpenas to secrete themselves and evade the service of process. It would diminish the importance of the process of the committee and suggest that all a recalcitrant witness need do is to hide from our process servers until February.

I think it is fundamental that if the Senate has the power to investigate, as undoubtedly the Senate has, it first must have the power to bring witnesses before it. It is certainly not in keeping with the dignity of the Senate to allow witnesses, by hiding and avoiding the person trying to serve the subpena to prevent carrying into effect the determination of the Senate to bring them before the Senate or a committee of the Senate for the purpose of giving testimony. If such a rule were to be enforced, it would be impossible in many instances for the Senate to make the proper kind of examination. This question has been studied very closely and thoroughly by the staff of the committee. The decisions of the Supreme Court are cited in the report. I hope that the work of the committee will not be held up by any delay in acting upon this resolution.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief reply to the argument of the Senator from Tennessee.

In the first place, it seems to me that the United States Senate should never forget that this is a special committee which was established to do certain things under the terms of a resolution which was adopted by the Senate. Whether, under the terms of the original resolution, the committee has the power to invoke this sort of procedure is a serious question in my mind. We should never grant to any special committee continuous powers to do a number of things which perhaps are not within the scope of the resolution itself. We definitely provided in that resolution that the committee itself should have the power to subpena all witnesses it believed necessary and advisable to call before the committee to carry out the purposes of Senate Resolution 202.

If the men whom the committee has employed cannot find these witnesses, I do not know who can. I understand that the committee has some of the best sleuths who have ever been employed by any committee of the Senate, and who have done nothing throughout their lives except to try to track down someone for some committee or agency of the Government, whether it was Federal, city, or county.

Mr. President, I say that we had better hestitate and pause for the moment, at least, before we transfer that power to the Sergeant at Arms and let the Sergeant at Arms, who is an important officer of the Senate, and who is needed here, start on a wild-goose chase. He would have to go before some committee of the Senate and ask for more money in order to set up another group of sleuths to find these men, some of whom are in Mexico at the present time. We had better pause and let some committee look into the situation before we take the drastic step which is requested by the Senator from Tennessee and other members of the special committee.

I am not attempting to shield anyone named in the resolution. I do not know any of the men named. I do not care anything about the so-called crooks whom the Senator is now trying to run down. But so long as I am in the Senate—and that will not be too long—I am going to try to protect the integrity of the rules of the United States Senate. I am not going to permit a special committee to get away with such a thing as is suggested here if I can possibly help it, without a standing committee passing upon the question. The United States Senate ought not to do that.

The suggested procedure may be proper. It may be the right thing to do. But at least the Judiciary Committee should have an opportunity to look into the question. There are good lawyers on that committee, whose function it is to do the very thing which I am suggesting. I believe that that committee should have the opportunity to pass upon this request.

Mr. President, it seems to me incredulous that a committee would come before the Senate and ask the Sergeant at Arms to set up another snooping committee, so to speak, and hunt for men whom they themselves cannot find. They have a sufficient number of investigators to do the job they are called upon to do. Let them come before the full committee and ask for more money. They can obtain the top men of the country if they pay them enough—and I think they are paying them plenty for the job they are doing. They can obtain more men. If those connected with the committee cannot find the witnesses who are sought, how are Joe Duke, the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States, and his assistants to find these crooks? Mr. President, I do not say that to disparage in any way my friend Joe Duke, because he comes from a section of the country where they know how to run down criminals. He has been ably taught by the "boss" of the Senate, my good friend, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who used to be a sheriff in Arizona, and who knows what it is all about. But to comply with the request would impose an additional burden upon the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. He could not carry out the order himself, and his assistants in the Senate could not do it. He would have to employ a dozen more men to go forth and hunt these witnesses whom the subcommittee cannot find.

Mr. President, to me it is the most ridiculous thing I have heard of in a long, long time, and I hope that the Senate of the United States will at least give a proper standing committee the right to look into the matter.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I wish to be heard in response to the remarks made by the distinguished majority leader. I believe we of the committee feel that if we, who are charged with the responsibility of carrying on the investigation, let the principal witnesses, as these people are, defy the United States Senate, and put off the matter of getting them before the committee promptly, we are not doing our duty. The group of witnesses who have been hiding from the subpenas of the committee and whose arrest is sought are among the most powerful and dangerous racketeers in the country. Our duty, as we see it, is to present the matter to the Senate, and to urge the Senate to help us secure the witnesses so we can carry on our investigation. That is the purpose of the resolution.

I do not think the point made by the majority leader is very well taken, that the distinguished Mr. Duke, the Sergeant at Arms, and his assistants would be required to do this work themselves. The resolution asks that they be authorized to call upon all the law-enforcement agencies of the United States Government to assist them in locating and apprehending these persons who are avoiding service. I wish to read that portion of the resolution to the Senate. The resolution states that for the purpose of executing the warrant issued in accordance with the resolution the Sergeant at Arms may by blanket order or orders deputize the enforcement officers of the Federal Government to apprehend these individuals.

Of course, what would happen, Mr. President, is that the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the other law-enforcement agencies of the Federal Government would be asked to make inquiry in various parts of the country as to where these individuals are. There would be no delay in securing them and bringing them in.

Mr. President, it is not a matter of adding more sleuths. We already have an efficient staff, including highly trained investigators, but we cannot possibly duplicate the Nation-wide investigative network of the FBI, and it would be folly for the committee to try to do so.

I am sure some Senators will recognize certain of the witnesses whose names are on the list contained in the resolution. We are asking for this extraordinary procedure only after most diligent effort on the part of many, many of our people, and by United States marshals in the particular places where these men live. Anthony "Tony" Accardo, alias Joe Batters, has of course a long record as a leading racketeer and as a person in criminal activity in the Chicago area.

Murray Humphreys is well known, and we have been trying to find him for a long time. He is intimately involved in the racing wire service picture.

As to Rocco Fischetti and Charles Fischetti, their reputations are well known, and the importance of the testimony they would give is, of course, easily recognized.

Martin M. Hartman is in San Francisco. He is a stock salesman. He was selling stock in what was alleged to be a bogus copper company called the Mountain City Consolidated Copper Co. in Nevada, which involves a very important matter involving interstate crime.

John Patton comes from Chicago, and has been partner in important operations in Florida. He is also involved in a racing wire question. We have tried long to find him.

Elmer Remmer is well known in California, Morris Rosen in New York, and Joseph Sica in the State of California. The testimony of Sica is wanted, among other reasons, because it would relate in part to illicit narcotic transactions on a major scale.

Mr. President, the final argument of the distinguished majority leader was that since the investigating committee is a special or select committee the matter should be referred to some other committee before action is taken. Insofar as I have been able to find by reading the cases, whenever a select or special committee has presented a statement to the United States Senate that in order to carry out its direction and mandate from the Senate additional authority shall be given it, the Senate has very readily responded to the recommendation of the select committee.

I believe the committee which investigated the Teapot Dome matter, out of which McGrain against Daugherty arose, was a select committee. But in any event one of the early precedents on the subject relates to John Brown's raid on Harpers Ferry.

In the Daugherty case the Supreme Court said about this incident at page 138:

In December 1859, the Senate, by resolution, appointed a committee to inquire into the facts concerning the invasion and seizure of the armory and arsenal at Harper's Ferry and to report facts and recommend legislation, the committee to have power to send for persons and papers.

That committee wanted to subpena and bring before it a witness by the name of Thaddeus Hyatt. I continue to read:

In February 1860, a resolution was adopted directing the Sergeant at Arms to take into his custody the body of Thaddeus Hyatt, and to have the same forthwith before the bar of the Senate to answer as for a contempt of its authority * * *. In upholding the existence of the power, the Senate did not divide on sectional lines, and the vote was overwhelmingly in support of the asserted power.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will back up the work our committee has been trying to do. It will be much more difficult for us to continue if the Senate is going to refuse to grant the relief asked for by this resolution. I do not think we need to refer to a committee for hearing and debate the question of whether gangsters and racketeers can play hide and seek with process servers of a committee of the United States Senate.

Mr. MAYBANK. I wonder whether there will be any further debate on the resolution relating to the Special Committee To Investigate Crime in Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the resolution reported by the Senator from Tennessee be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary [putting the question].

The "ayes" have it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I demand a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has already made the determination.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not request the yeas and nays, but I ask for a standing division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The determination has already been made.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, a point of order: I have been here a long time waiting to have us proceed with the rent-control joint resolution, and waiting for the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] to have an opportunity to speak on that measure. I have yielded to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. KEFAUVER subsequently said: Mr. President, I move for a reconsideration of the vote taken earlier in the day by which the resolution from the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I wish to give notice at this time that at the conclusion of the morning hour tomorrow I shall ask for a vote on the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

CREDENTIALS

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk the credentials of my colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLEMENTS], elected a United States Senator from the State of Kentucky, for the term commencing January 3, 1951.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLEMENTS in the chair). The credentials will be read and placed on file.

The credentials were read and placed on file, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Frankfort.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November 1950 EARLE C. CLEMENTS was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Kentucky a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of 6 years, beginning on the 3d day of January 1951.

Witness His Excellency our Governor, EARLE C. CLEMENTS, and our seal hereto affixed at Frankfort this 16th day of November in the year of our Lord 1950.

EARLE C. CLEMENTS,
Governor.

By the Governor:
GEORGE GLENN HATCHER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I send to the desk for filing the credentials of my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] for the term commencing January 3, 1951. I am extremely happy to be able to present the credentials at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The credentials will be read and placed on file.

The credentials were read and placed on file, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
THE STATE OF WISCONSIN,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November 1950, ALEXANDER WILEY was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Wisconsin a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of 6 years, commencing on the 3d day of January 1951.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Wisconsin to be affixed. Done at the capitol in the city of Madison this 28th day of November in the year of our Lord 1950.

OSCAR RENNEBOHM,
Governor.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] FRED L. ZIMMERMAN,
Secretary of State.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I send to the desk the credentials of HERMAN WELKER, elected a United States Senator from the State of Idaho for the term commencing January 3, 1951.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The credentials will be read and placed on file.

The credentials were read and placed on file, as follows:

STATE OF IDAHO,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION

To All to Whom These Presents Shall Come, Greeting:

Whereas the State Board of Canvassers of the State of Idaho, in obedience to the provisions of section 34–1304 of the Idaho Code, has found, certified, and declared that a canvass of the abstract of votes cast at the general election held in the State of Idaho on the 7th day of November 1950 shows that HERMAN WELKER, of Payette, has received the greatest number of legal votes cast for the office of United States Senator (6-year term).

Now, therefore, I, J. D. Cy Price, Secretary of State of the State of Idaho, do hereby declare and certify that said HERMAN WELKER, of Payette, has been duly and regularly elected to the office of United States Senator (6-year term) for the term beginning January 1, 1951, and is entitled to all the rights, honors, and privileges pertaining thereto.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Boise City, the capital of Idaho, this 27th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1950 and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and seventy-five.

[SEAL] J. D. CY PRICE,
Secretary of State.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an order providing for the assignment to committees of the distinguished junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] and the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. NIXON], and request that it be read.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. CARLSON be, and he is hereby, assigned to service on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

That Mr. NIXON be, and he is hereby, assigned to service on the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, these assignments are to be effective only until the 2d day of January 1951, when this Congress will expire. I ask that the order be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the order submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

The order was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, the measure before the Senate at this time involves an extension of the rent-control law, the termination date only being proposed to be changed from the last day of December of this year until February 28, 1951. The effect of such an extension would be to continue Federal rent control over about 1,000 or 1,200 communities, depending upon the number that decontrol between now and the end of the year, although they have not expressly, by resolution or by referendum in the local communities, asked for continuing Federal control.

As we recall, about 6 months ago it was the understanding among the Members of the Senate, on the part of both the opponents and the proponents of rent-control extension at that time, that that would be the last extension of rent control. As a result, each community in the United States which then was under rent control was given the privilege, by way of resolution or by proper legal enactment on the part of the governing body of the local community or by referendum among the citizens of the community, of asking for a continuance of rent control, federally administered, for 6 months beyond December 31, 1950.

The pending joint resolution would not change any of the provisions of that law, except it would continue that Federal rent-control imposition for another 2 months, which would give the communities the right to ask for another 2 months of continuing Federal rent control, and we would also impose Federal rent control upon the communities which did not ask for it. In other words, during the lapse which would occur, the millions of home owners and rental property owners would not get the benefit of the market value of their property until some future date.

The basis upon which Mr. Tighe Woods and Mr. Stuart Symington have asked for such an extension is that there has been a change of conditions as a result of the Korean war episode, that a continuation of rent control is necessary in order not to cause a maladjustment, and that we should have a period of an additional 2 months in order to avoid the doing of harm and to provide an opportunity for the consideration of a new rent-control bill.

The fact is that if the law remains as it is, there will still be a period of an additional 6 months in which the Congress may write a new law and in which the communities which want to have a continuance of rent control during that period will be able to have Federal administration of local rent control. So there is not a great deal of effect upon our economy generally because of the lack of the power on the part of the local communities to ask the Federal Government to do for them that which they should do for themselves.

About the only change which has come about as a result of the Korean war episode, so far as rent control is concerned, is, possibly, a shift of population, first a shift of population to the war-production centers. When that occurs, there may be some need for further consideration of Federal rent control. That will be determined by the facts, which we do not know today, and which we cannot possibly anticipate. The second effect will be the taking of young men into camps and military establishments. Already much power has been given to the Army and to the Navy and to the Air Force to construct homes in the encampment areas. Other housing will have to be constructed, of course; and in addition to construction by the Government, there will have to be construction in those communities by private capital. It may be that when that is done, there will be need for Federal control of rents in the war-encampment areas.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The extension here proposed will not affect those areas, will it?

Mr. BRICKER. Not in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. TAFT. Because the committee itself has said:

> Nor would such an extension of the automatic decontrol date authorize the Housing Expediter to bring under Federal rent control any area already or hereafter removed from the scope of Federal rent control.

Mr. BRICKER. My colleague is exactly correct. That problem cannot be faced at all under this measure. It is a new problem which we can face, and should face, when we have all the facts before us and know all of them.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I heartily concur with the distinguished Senators from Ohio in saying that those problems cannot be faced now; but in the committee we voted for the 60-day extension in order that other problems developing around the camps, such as the problem in Missouri, at Camp Leonard Wood, may be handled.

Mr. BRICKER. But this measure gives no authority, I think the Senator will agree, to reimpose rent control in any community where it has ceased.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is done only by the community itself.

Mr. BRICKER. And it must be done before the end of this year.

Mr. MAYBANK. This measure would provide an extension of 2 months in which it might be done.

Mr. BRICKER. Yes; but the communities already have had 6 months in which to ask for a continuance of rent control, if they desire it continued in their areas.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is entirely correct. However, the situations which have developed in the past few months, with the concentration of troops in camps, have caused a desire for further rent control. I am sure the Senator will agree to that statement.

I was one of the Senators who said, last year, that I hoped we would never have to consider another rent-control bill. However, I must say, and I think my good friend who worked on the committee so hard with me will agree, that in a small number of instances there are demands for a continuation of rent control.

Mr. BRICKER. The testimony before the committee by Mr. Tighe Woods, who presented to the committee the only direct testimony received on this measure, was that more than 800 local communities have voted to continue rent control.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is correct. However, during the past few weeks others have taken advantage of that opportunity.

I think it is regrettable that other communities have not taken advantage of the opportunity. Nevertheless, members of the Armed Forces and considerable numbers of other persons have moved into certain areas, whereas several months ago we did not believe they would be called upon to do so.

Mr. BRICKER. But the areas into which the soldiers and other members of the Armed Forces are moving are not now generally under rent control. If they are, they can decide between now and 6 months from now whether they wish to have rent control continued for both rental property and home owners.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator will recall that a number of years ago we passed a housing bill designed to make credit easily obtainable by young men desiring to acquire or build homes. The Senator will also recall that within the past 2 months the President has nullified the effect of the easy-credit bill by raising the credit terms and making it impossible for a young man either to build or to buy a home unless he has much more cash. The Senator will further recall, I am sure, as I do, that since that occurred, the number of homes which have been begun has decreased very drastically.

I am sure the Senator is aware of the fact that at the time when we were drafting that bill, called the Housing Act of 1948, we had extended conferences with the sections of labor having to do with construction—the American Federation of Labor building trades unions. The Senator will recall that at that time we had much difficulty because of the shortage of labor, and that the building trades unions went along with us 100 percent. They said, in effect, "If you will pass a law making it easy for young men to get credit, so that we can be sure that the new men we add to our unions will have work, we will go along 100 percent in increasing our apprentices."

The Senator will further recall that in the last month or two, vast numbers of men in the building trades have been forced out of work because of this arbitrary action on the part of the President.

I wonder whether the Senator will agree with me that the President has, in effect, by nullifying our Housing Act giving easy credit to those young men, on his own initiative rationed building materials to those who have money, and taken building materials away from young men with credit; and by that action he is creating a tremendous housing shortage which well may make rent controls necessary in the next 6 or 7 months.

Mr. BRICKER. Possibly that is true, if the shortage should continue. But at the present time the number of units which will be cut from the building program this year, as well as those cut from it last year, is approximately 400,000—perhaps a little more or perhaps a little less.

There has also been a softening of the credit conditions to the GI's and the veterans, and I think a greater ratio of the money that is borrowed for building purposes will go into the GI's building programs, possibly, than has heretofore gone into the veterans' building program.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I desire to accommodate some of our good friends on both sides of the aisle in connection with this debate. Many of the Senators have a good deal of other work to attend to, so I am going to request at this time, that when the joint resolution is ready for a vote the yeas-and-nays be ordered, so that Senators on both sides of the aisle who have important business engagements may be able to keep them. I ask that the yeas and nays be ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand for the yeas-and-nays sufficiently seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYBANK. I thank the Senator from Ohio for yielding.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I wonder whether the Senator will agree with me that it would be an excellent idea for his committee to conduct hearings for the purpose of ascertaining the effect the President's arbitrary order has had on the building program, and to determine the extent to which it is cutting down production, the extent to which it is making it impossible for young men to build or to buy homes, and the extent to which the President's order may make rent controls necessary for another 6 months or for another year, by reason of the decrease in the number of units being built.

Mr. BRICKER. I think the Senator's suggestion is an excellent one. Let me say to him that the housing bill of 1948, to which I referred a moment ago, was very liberal, so that last year there were built about 1,300,000 units.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from South Carolina whether it is expected that we shall vote on this bill tonight, or whether it will in all probability go over until tomorrow.

Mr. BRICKER. I shall not take very much more time—probably not over 15 minutes.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, several Senators are scheduled to speak, two or three from the Republican side of the aisle. I understood that the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] desired to be heard. What I proposed to do was to request unanimous consent that we vote at 3 o'clock tomorrow. With the speeches which have been indicated as yet to come, I do not think we could vote tonight. The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] suggested that he would speak but about half an hour. It may require longer than that. So I propose a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at 3 o'clock tomorrow. I understand the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] wishes to speak, and also his colleague from the State of Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say to the able Senator that if I speak, it will only be for about 2 or 3 minutes.

Mr. MAYBANK. There may be other Senators who will desire to speak for 2 or 3 minutes. The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] will no doubt speak for an hour. I would suggest, if agreeable, that we enter into a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at 3 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, it seems to me that would delay the matter. Why does the Senator not simply suggest an agreement that we shall not vote tonight, but that we shall proceed until we come to the end of the debate, and then vote on it tomorrow?

Mr. MAYBANK. I am unable to speak for the majority leader, of course.

Mr. TAFT. I think that would be quicker.

Mr. LUCAS. Yes, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Ohio is correct in his statement, and I should like to follow the procedure he suggests and go as far as we can tonight. In the meantime Senators will not have to worry about voting on the measure tonight.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Then, do I correctly understand from the Senator from South Carolina that he will not press for a vote tonight, and that Senators may safely attend to other matters?

Mr. MAYBANK. That is what the majority leader has suggested, and I shall abide by it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, the whole problem of rental units around Army encampments and in the defense production centers is an entirely new one, separate and apart from the rent-control law, an extension of which we are now considering. It will mean a maladjustment, of course, of rental conditions in many communities, because any man who goes into a new community, whether a war-production center or a camp, will leave a vacancy in the community from which he goes; and that must be taken into consideration. The smaller communities which have not asked for Federal control no doubt have failed to ask because they did not want Federal controls continued. That question was not not very thoroughly probed. But the Expediter came before our committee to give us the figures on the number of homes which are now under rent control, and the effect that this measure would have upon the total number.

He testified that there are today 7,500,000 rental housing units remaining under Federal rent control, 3,430,000 of which will remain under rent control through June 30, 1951, by virtue of the action of local governing bodies to date. This leaves, so he said, about 4,000,000 units from which Federal rent control will be removed on December 31, 1950. Of course, he did not make an estimate as to the number of communities that might ask for a continuance in the interim period of 30 days, neither did he take into consideration nor bring to the attention of the committee the fact that 2,000,000 units in the controlled areas have been withdrawn because people would not continue them under rental conditions such as those imposed by the Expediter.

We are facing at the present time a more serious situation than we had when this law was extended the last time; and it was unjustified at that time. We are today facing a boom on top of a boom—a war boom upon a peacetime inflation—and no one knows the extent to which the war boom will go. No one knows the amount of inflation which will result from the spending of billions upon multiplied billions of dollars by the Federal Government for the war program. No one knows the effect it will have upon employment. No one knows yet the effect it will have upon the personal income of labor throughout the country and of other citizens generally. But the figures are very significant when we stop to consider the increases in living costs and in income which have already taken place in America.

An index of the cost of living of 1950, prepared by a company in St. Louis, Mo., was introduced; and I believe the figures set forth to be authentic. The base period was 1921 to 1938, which was taken as 100. Let us see what has happened in the meantime to wages. From that period to the present time, wages have increased 239 percent. Let us keep those figures in mind—239 percent. Household furnishings have gone up 181 percent. Food—and in the case of the average family the item of food cost is three times the rental cost—has gone up 172 percent. Clothing has gone up 166 percent, and rents since 1930 have gone up only 96 percent. That is about one-third of what the total increase of wages has been.

At the present time we are in a serious situation internationally. The United States is now in desperate circumstances, and we dare not destroy the very basic, sound foundation of our population and civilization. The rent-control law, for too long a period, has been placed upon the people who have tried to provide their own social security against the day of their need. Too long have they had to carry too much of the reconstruction cost in this country; and they have not had an adequate return upon the property they have held for rent. That is why more than 2,000,000 units have gone off the rental market within the past 2 years. The owners cannot pay the cost of operation of their property. They cannot pay the maintenance and upkeep from the rents they receive, based upon a 1941 rental base.

What has happened in the meantime? According to Mr. Woods, the Expediter—and he said it, as if in a spirit of generosity—he has given the property owners an over-all 15 percent increase in rents on their property—15 percent, when other costs have gone up as much as from 100 to 250 percent. The owners of property, who have saved money, who have lived, according to him, in keeping with the old ideas which have inspired us for a century and a half, have been pressed down to the earth. They cannot live upon their incomes. They have either had to sell their property, go to work again, become a burden upon their relatives, or do as many officials around Washington want them to do—become wards of the Federal Government, so they will be able to give them a subsidy of some kind of other.

There are but a few other phases of this question which I want to bring to the attention of the Senate in order to show the kind of testimony we had before our committee. I have read the reports.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. It seems to me that the distinguished Senator from Ohio is maintaining that it is high time and a proper time to get rid of an office, at the earliest possible minute, which in the course of approximately 10 years has reduced by approximately 2,000,000 units the rental accommodations in the United States. Is that a fair assumption?

Mr. BRICKER. It is a fair assumption. I shall read those figures into the RECORD presently, for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. CAIN. I shall appreciate that.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. Woods came before our committee. He is the Expediter. I do not hesitate to say—because I told him this in the committee—that I think the Expediter has done a poor job. I think he has done an immoral job; at times, an illegal job, so far as his administration is concerned. He is one of the poorer of the bureaucrats around Washington, in my judgment. He came before us, and this is his testimony, and it is in the report:

> In Weirton, W. Va., an official of the Weirton Steel Co. reported that the company has lost and is still losing employees due to the lack of adequate housing.

I asked him for the name of the man, and I got it. We called that man a little while ago, and he told us very definitely that the statement was made a year ago, and, yet, Mr. Woods said that this gentleman said, "They are still losing employees," as if it had been that day, or very close to the day he testified. The statement was made a year ago. At that time, according to the statement, they were losing employees at the Weirton Steel Co. plant. But I do not know what rent control had to do with it, or the problem we have at the present time, because they had rent control there at that time, and they still have it. I think it is one of the communities which have asked for its extension. Whenever an employee leaves, he causes a vacancy. Someone else must come in and take over. But this same man told us over the telephone a short time ago that relatively few complaints had come in lately. He stated that there is still a shortage of low-cost housing. We shall never get to the bottom of the housing question according to some groups of people, who want rents constantly lower and lower. Many people feel that the Federal Government ought to provide them with rental units, as well as keeping down the rentals of the units.

A moment ago the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] called my attention to a fact which is very pertinent at this time, as it was pertinent 6 months ago when I pointed it out to the Senate. The fact is that the total population of the United States in 1940 was 131,669,275. In 1950 the total population is 150,697,361.

In 1940 the total number of dwellings, according to the Census Bureau, was 37,325,470. In 1950 the total number of dwellings is 46,151,107. The number of dwellings increased; so that at the present time the housing situation in America is much better, on the basis of population and number of dwelling units available, than it was in 1940.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. Yes.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator know how many such units are classified as rental units?

Mr. BRICKER. The total number of dwelling units under control as of March 1949, was 14,250,000. The number of units which the Office of the Housing Expediter states have been decontrolled from April 1, 1949, to November 3, 1950, is 6,439,124. From the total figure should also be subtracted an estimated 2,000,000 units which have been withdrawn from the rental market, for owner occupancy, during the period of rent control, as well as approximately 20,000 units which are estimated to have been withdrawn in the past 2 years by reason of demolition, fire, storm, and so forth.

Therefore it is estimated that the total number of units still under rent control as of November 3, 1950, is 5,831,124.

Mr. TAFT. Are the 5,831,000 units now under rent control?

Mr. BRICKER. They were still under rent control as of November 3, 1950.

Mr. TAFT. I was interested in the total number of housing units which are being rented today, controlled and not controlled.

Mr. BRICKER. I do not have the figure available. As I remember, it was approximately 18,000,000 or 19,000,000. That is only my recollection of 6 months ago.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRICKER. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. As I recall, approximately 16,000,000 units were under rent control at the peak of control in 1946. My memory tells me that there was approximately a total of only 18,000,000 rental units available in the country.

Mr. BRICKER. That was the figure I had in mind. In other words, Mr. President, the housing condition is in better condition today than it was in 1940. The percentage of urban units in good condition or in need of only minor repairs in 1940 was 88.6 percent. In 1947 it was 93.2 percent. The percentage of all ordinary dwelling units in good condition or in need of only minor repairs was 81.8 percent in 1940. In 1947 it was 90.1 percent. These figures are taken from Current Population Report—Housing, Series P–70, No. 1, as of April 1947, United States Bureau of Census, table 4, page 11. They are the latest published census data on the state of housing repair.

In the third place, the total housing supply in the United States has increased at a rate greater than the population has increased since 1940. The population increase from 1940 to 1950 was 14.4 percent. The increase in number of dwelling units was 23.6 percent. These figures also come from the Census Bureau.

The large apartment units, about which we hear so much, particularly with reference to the greed which the landlords have exhibited by imposing on people who live in apartments—and we hear much of that in Washington, New York, and Chicago, especially in New York, where they have local control—contain only slightly more than one-fifth of the rental housing available in the United States. The percentage of all rental housing in single-family houses is 47.6 percent. The percentage of all rental housing in structures which contain one, two, three, or four dwelling units is 78.6 percent. Therefore, almost one-half of the total number of rental units in the United States are single-family houses. These figures are taken from Sixteenth Census of the United States—Housing, volume II, part I, Washington, 1943, table 4A, page 11. They are the latest data available.

The Senator from Washington referred to this point a moment ago. The effect of rent control and its administration has been what it has been in every country where it has been imposed. The effect was the same as in France and in England. The effect was to decrease the number of available rental units. The total number of tenant-occupied dwelling units in the United States in 1940 was 19,659,000. The total number of tenant-occupied dwelling units in the United States as of April 1947, which are the latest census figures, is 17,669,000. Therefore, in total supply of rental housing a loss has occured of 1,990,000 units. These are the latest figures available.

The same principle is working in the United States. When the Government takes control of property of its citizens and forces them to operate it at less than its economic value, rental units are not built or many of those already constructed are not continued under rental conditions. As a result of the rent-control law we have had a decrease in the number of rental units available. At the same time the number of dwelling units in the United States has been increased far out of proportion to the increase in population. The result has been a commendable one, of course, but that was not the purpose of the law. Neither was the result due to rent control. We have the largest number of home owners we have ever had in the history of the United States. Nearly 50 percent of all dwelling units are owner occupied. Mr. President, that is a most gratifying situation, and I hope the number of home owners will increase, because it means that we shall have a stable population. Home owners do not take part in revolutions. Home owners are not Communists. Home owners are not against their Government. Home owners are not in favor of lavish and unconscionable expenditure of public funds, because their property stands out and can be taxed. There is no way they can get away from it. I am pleading for those people in America who strengthen our society, who try to provide their own social security, and who are trying to keep out of the clutches of both the Federal and State governments, and to avoid becoming the wards of either.

This is no time to continue the rent control law. Let us face it in the next Congress as a real issue on the basis of changing conditions. Let us take care of the situation around war plants, Army camps, and such concentrated areas, but let the other problem solve itself at the local level, where it should have been taken care of at all times.

OUR BLIND FOREIGN POLICY, OUR TOTAL LACK OF PREPAREDNESS, AND THE DESPERATE FUTURE

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, considerable surprise is being occasioned and expressed at the helplessness which is being shown by the administration in the face of disaster, and at the total absence of an effective foreign policy.

Mr. President, the only surprise that should be occasioned is that anyone should be surprised.

GENERAL MAC ARTHUR PREVENTED FROM ATTACKING VITAL BASES

We are faced with a situation in which General MacArthur is prevented from attacking the bases of operation of our enemies. Mr. Acheson and his satellites blame General MacArthur's intelligence service, totally ignoring their own pitiful intelligence effort leading to the so-called police action in Korea.

AMPLE WARNING—UN CANNOT DIRECT THE FRONT LINE

Mr. President, there was plenty of information and warning from many sources. Only the blind and stubborn could refuse to see and understand the danger.

Mr. President, our field armed services can be so handicapped that even MacArthur may lose a war. An effective war cannot be fought from the leather cushions in the New York United Nations. In that connection, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point and as part of my remarks a compilation of excerpts of articles by Constantine Brown from December 18, 1949, to November 30, 1950.

There being no objection the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

December 18, 1949: "The world crisis * * * is expected to enter its final phase with the coming of the new year. The Russians have nearly completed the circle which they have so skillfully been building around us since VJ-day." Confirmed June 25, 1950.

January 23, 1950: "It is believed * * * they will concentrate * * * in South Korea, Indochina, Burma and eventually the Malay Peninsula."

February 5: "The United States is in a more critical situation than ever before in its history."

February 24: "We are in a weaker position with respect to Russia today than we were with respect to Japan 9 years ago."

April 30: "Russia * * * has given indications that she is tiring of the cold war and is preparing to move into action."

May 9: "More than 2,000 Soviet officers are engaged * * * in planning coming events in Asia which is expected to become the principal theater of a shooting war this summer."

June 4: "Whatever explosion may occur in the near future will come on the Asiatic mainland."

June 6: "The start of the * * * Communist invasion * * * is set for the second half of this month." Confirmed June 25.

September 1: "The middle of September will see Russian puppet Ho Chi Minh's Communist force launch an offensive against the French troops in Indochina." Confirmed September 19.

September 11: "Chinese forces * * * on the Korean border have moved in and now are fighting under the North Korean banner."

October 4: "Chinese Communist troops are definitely capable of going into action on an hour's notice."

November 7: "Our forces in Korea are so entangled by advancing Chinese Communists that only a heavy bombardment * * * between Mukden and the Yalu River can disentangle them."

November 7: "Behind the 300,000 Chinese troops on the Yalu River and in North Korea there are at least as many more troops available for action."

November 11: "A major attack by the Chinese Communist armies in North Korea is expected in the next 10 days. * * * Last week's attack * * * is considered a reconnaissance in force." Confirmed November 28.

November 28: "General MacArthur is reported to have asked the United Nations permission to send B-29 and B-36 planes to destroy the lines of communication * * * at Mukden and Harbin."

November 30: "Use of the atomic bomb and Chinese Nationalist troops against the Chinese Communist hordes is now being discussed * * * in secret high-level discussions in the last 48 hours. * * * We must face the stark fact that we are at war with Communist China, and by extension, with the U. S. S. R."

TAXPAYERS OF AMERICA ARMED RUSSIA-CHINESE COMMUNISTS

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, in March of 1948, in March 1949, and again in March of this year, 1950, the junior Senator from Nevada set forth, in extended debates, that the taxpayers of America were being forced to pay for arming Russia and her satellite nations for world war III, through the Marshall plan.

In 1948 several trade treaties between the proposed Marshall-plan countries and Russia and her satellites, the eastern European countries, were inserted in the RECORD. That was in March of 1948 at the inception of the Marshall plan.

In March 1949, on the occasion of its extension, a list of 88 such treaties were inserted in the RECORD. In January of this year a list of 96 such treaties, in good standing, between the Marshall-plan countries, Russia, and the satellite countris of eastern Europe were inserted in the RECORD, showing that at that time material of almost every imaginable nature was being furnished to Russia, including ball bearings, tool steel, tools, electrical equipment, and many other materials.

At that time the British, through Hong Kong, were continually furnishing to Korean and Chinese Communists materials of war.

I digress at this time to say that any material usable to prepare for war—even shirt buttons—is a war material. Such materials are needed to fight a war.

GASOLINE, RUBBER TO COMMUNISTS

These shipments continued, and are being made even at the present time. I invite attention to the fact that in July of this year 650,000 gallons of gasoline were shipped to North China by the British through Hong Kong. Nine thousand tons of rubber were shipped from Malaya, largely through Hong Kong.

RUSSIA BIDDING AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

In November 1948, the junior Senator from Nevada was in Singapore. Already at that time tin and rubber were being shipped to Russia. Russia was bidding against the United States for strategic materials. That situation has continued until the present time. That is one of the reasons for the very high prices which the United States must pay for rubber and tin.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the distinguished Senator for the observations he is making. The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] made some observations with reference to exports from the satellite countries and from countries which are the recipients of ECA aid, of materials which are exported directly, and materials which are fabricated in the interchange. Such materials are now being used in Korea against our boys.

I invite the attention of the distinguished Senator from Nevada to the fact that those of us who introduced the resolution to prohibit the exportation to the recipient countries were voted down by a very narrow margin in the last session of the Congress. But it behooves the Eighty-second Congress to reexamine the record in the light of these shipments. From now on those who are the beneficiaries and recipients of the money of the taxpayers of this country should not be permitted to continue to ship such materials to the satellite countries. They are fabricated by the enemy, and are now destroying our boys.

I thank the Senator for bringing this subject to the attention of the Senate once again. I admonish the membership of the Senate that due consideration should be given to the observations of the distinguished Senator from Nevada when he talks about the shipment of scarce materials into various countries which are using them for the benefit of the satellites. The goods are falling into the hands of those who are using them against our men. The goods are not being used for the purposes for which they were originally intended.

MALONE-WHERRY-KEM AMENDMENT

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I join with the distinguished Senator from Nebraska in what he says. I joined in support of the amendment to the ECA Act prohibiting such shipments which was voted down. That amendment would have retarded or prevented such shipments. I join with the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] in what he said today.

AMERICAN TAXPAYERS FINANCED DESTRUCTION OF OUR FLEET

The junior Senator from Nevada has previously stated on this floor that the airplanes which destroyed our fleet at Pearl Harbor were largely constructed from materials which were sent from this country to Japan prior to World War II, and were fueled by petroleum sent out through the Golden Gate in plain sight of everyone, with all the veterans' organizations in the country screaming to high heaven about it in 1938 and 1939. Nothing was done about it. The same thing is being done now. It seems that some time we should learn.

JULY HONG KONG SHIPMENTS TO COMMUNISTS

Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a list of Communist purchases in Hong Kong in July. The statement gives approximate figures for Communist purchases in Hong Kong during the month of July.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMUNIST PURCHASES IN HONG KONG AND ELSEWHERE

Communist buying agents are out to grab as much gasoline as possible before the local market is completely denied them. The total amount smuggled into Communist China is about 40 to 50 tons a day. The smuggling routes are through Castle Peak and Shangshui in new territories, although some junk owners were last week fined by police magistrates for smuggling petroleum products from Hong Kong.

The Red authorities in Shumchun, across the British border, permit their purchasing agents of oil to pay Hong Hong currency for the goods, as smugglers do not accept Communist paper money known as Jen Min Piao. As a result, the search for Hong Kong bank notes by Red customs authorities at Schumchun has been less strict for the past 2 weeks.

Communist buyers are also purchasing a good quantity of rubber. From mid-July to mid-August they bought about 6,000 tons of raw rubber from Malaya largely through Hong Kong. From January to June this year, the total imports of rubber from Malaya direct to Communist China amounted to 34,662 tons. In July direct shipments to Russia were 9,000 tons.

There is no embargo on rubber from Malaya to Communist China and the U. S. S. R., but consignments of this commodity from Hong Kong are subject to license.

COMMUNIST PURCHASES IN HONG KONG IN JULY

The following chart gives the approximate figures of Communist purchases in Hong Kong during the month of July:

	Value in Hong Kong currency
Purchases shipped to North China:
Gasoline, 254,545 gallons	387,925
Cotton, 30,934 piculs	7,697,508
Gunny bags, 240,000 units	632,500
Lubrication oil, 120 drums	456,634
Newsprint, 20,600 reams	411,500
Purchases shipped to Central China:
Gasoline, 173,277 gallons	350,661
Cotton, 2,442 piculs	516,272
Petroleum, 50,932 gallons	78,400
Gunny bags, 73,200 units	116,600
Lubrication oil, 528 tons	102,972
Crude oil, 1,310 tons	128,034
Purchases shipped to South China:
Gasoline, 231,954 gallons	548,033
Cotton, 2,670 piculs	712,000
Petroleum, 75,409 gallons	115,710
Gunny bags, 1,500 units	11,500
Lubrication oil, — tons	124,296
Crude oil, 329 tons	100,488
Newsprint, 460 reams	88,016

ARMING RUSSIA FOR THIRD WORLD WAR

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I agree with the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], who has joined me several times during the past several months in debates calling the attention of the Senate and of the public to the fact that through many of the trade treaties to which reference has been made Russia, Communist China, and Korea were armed for a third world war.

The reports from North Korea indicate that today many of our boys are surrounded. Rumor has it that at least one division, or one large group of our boys is practically wiped out.

DESTROYED BY OUR OWN EQUIPMENT

They are facing today a large amount of armor, guns, trucks, and much other material financed by the taxpayers of America and shipped to Russia and the iron curtain countries through the 16 Marshall-plan countries, or shipped to Communist China and Korea by Great Britain, largely through Hong Kong.

STATE DEPARTMENT AWARE OF SHIPMENTS TO COMMUNIST AREAS

This is not the same as if we were telling the State Department and the Department of Commerce about something they did not already know. They know it. They have known it since the advent of the Marshall plan. They have ignored it.

Mr. Dulles said at a luncheon meeting with the Republicans of the Senate that there was a large segment of the State Department and its advisers which thought a dose of communism would be good for Asia. There is no secret, Mr. President, as to at least some of the personnel of that segment of the State Department. The list contains Mr. Lattimore, the Secretary of State himself, and Mr. Hiss, as long as he was allowed to remain in the State Department. The latter was convicted of perjury, not of actually being a traitor, simply because the statute of limitations had run against such a charge. That segment was led by a clique including Hiss, Lattimore, and Acheson himself.

ACHESON PROMISED ENGLAND UNITED STATES WOULD FOLLOW THEM

Mr. President, in the opinion of the junior Senator from Nevada, in September of 1949, Mr. Acheson promised to follow England in the recognition of Communist China. The junior Senator from Nevada made that statement on the floor of the Senate in September 1949. At that time England warned us, in addition to the fact that it was going to recognize Communist China, that it was going to devalue its currency. Cripps denied that seven times, but England did devalue its currency just as soon as the members returned home from a conference at Washington, which was attended by delegates from Canada as well as by the British delegates.

England did recognize Communist China. There is no question in my mind but that Acheson expected to follow the recognition of Communist China by England, with recognition by this country. But there was so much objection on the Senate floor that that part of the matter was delayed.

ACHESON'S EUROPEAN CONFERENCE

It will be remembered that Mr. Acheson went to Europe and held a conference with representatives of certain European nations; that when he came back he appeared before a joint meeting of the Senate and the House and made a speech lasting about an hour. We had heard about 40 times before everything he said in that speech, except one little line, one little statement that was buried in the 1-hour speech. What was that line? Leading up to it fast, and getting away from it fast, he stated:

The United States will not use its veto to prevent the admission of Communist China to the United Nations.

ACHESON HELPS SECURE VOTES RECOGNIZING COMMUNIST CHINA

Since that time it has also been the opinion of the junior Senator from Nevada that Acheson has worked unflaggingly with England to obtain the necessary votes for admission of Communist China to the United Nations, with this Nation voting against it.

As soon as that is done there will be propaganda going up from the State Department that we must, of course, follow this by recognition to preserve our trade in China and Asia.

ADDITIONAL WARNING OF DISASTER

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, in line with the warning which has heretofore been given, an article by George Sokolsky, published in the Times-Herald of today, December 4.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

The wise man, when he faces a crisis in his life, steps back and asks himself, "What have I done?" He reexamines his life; he seeks out his faults; but most of all, he probes for a way to cut his losses, to reverse his processes, and to straighten himself out.

Only fools blame the environment, the times, the breaks, luck. No one gets very far in life by sulking and scheming. Only an imbecile devotes himself to covering up mistakes by new lies, until his structure collapses on his head. A lie has a curious way of fighting to the surface.

What is true of individuals is true of nations. The crisis appears. At that moment, a nation either blindly and stiffneckedly pursues the course which produced the crisis, or its best minds devote themselves to a reexamination of conduct with a view to rechanneling its attitudes.

Since 1939, it is apparent, beyond doubt, that great errors have been made by the leaders of our Nation. These errors need to be reexamined, not to blame the living or the dead, but to safeguard the future. I shall here list only a few demonstrable errors:

1. Our association with Soviet Russia in the war without prior stipulations as to peace terms. It is suggested that there was no time to work out a full peace program. That is a cover-up. There was ample time to outline the general terms of our participation.

2. The lend-lease agreements gave not ample protections to the United States. Lend-lease to a large degree won the war for Soviet Russia. We contributed $11,000,000,000 to the upbuilding of Soviet Russia's industrial and military strength. Peacetime equipment should not have been provided.

3. Tehran (November 1943) represents the abnegation of American control of American decisions in foreign affairs. At Tehran the United States gave Soviet Russia, then weak, a blank check in Europe and Asia.

4. Tehran belied the Cairo declaration made about 5 days earlier. Both the Cairo declaration and the report on the Tehran conference were issued simultaneously on December 1, 1943. But on that date, the Cairo declaration had already been nullified by Tehran. Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin, on that date, established an historic lie. For that our blood is being shed in Korea.

5. Roosevelt should not have gone to Yalta, because he was a dying man. He lacked the physical or moral strength to meet the challenge of empire.

6. During the war years we were in association with Soviet Russia as an ally, but it was never necessary to accept Communists. It was the Charley-good-fellow attitude that made it possible for Americans and aliens who were serving as Russian agents to infiltrate our Government in high positions.

The existence of the Harold Ware cell was known to President Roosevelt in 1939. He never acted. In fact, such agencies as the FBI were forbidden to arrest known and effective Russian spies.

7. It was a grievous error to make it impossible for the atomic energy authorities to dismiss suspects without proof. A man had no rights to work there. It was a privilege, to be withdrawn at will.

Furthermore, Acheson was one of a body that agreed to write a report. He was only a writer in this respect. The report on the future of the use of atomic energy should have been a closely guarded secret, otherwise we lost bargaining power.

The so-called Acheson-Lilienthal report was issued and publicized under shameful circumstances. When Baruch assumed the job of negotiation at the United Nations, he was plagued by this report.

8. The abandonment and betrayal of Chiang Kai-shek by the State Department from 1944, when he was still fighting, to this moment, when he is still offering to fight, is one of the most grievous errors in all history.

It was designed originally by Soviet Russia and carried out by Russian agents in the State Department, among whom the most publicized is Alger Hiss. A vast and untruthful campaign to justify this treason to America was conducted by the State Department.

After Soviet Russia had won a complete victory in China, Great Britain accepted the role of appeaser which the American State Department imitated. That policy produced the Korean War.

INFORMED PUBLIC OPINION THROUGH THE NEWS

Mr. MALONE. In the article George Sokolsky enumerates the mistakes that were made by the administration over a long period of time.

Anyone familiar with Mr. Sokolsky's column over the last year and a half, as well as that written by Mr. Constantine Brown, including columns and news dispatches written by other well-known writers, know that they have for a long period of time continually warned of exactly what is happening today.

ATTLEE TO WARN PRESIDENT MUST NOT DEVIATE FROM ENGLAND'S PROGRAM

Mr. President, it is the opinion of the junior Senator from Nevada that Mr. Attlee has come here to warn the President tomorrow that he must not deviate from the policy outlined by England's Government to Acheson several months ago:

(a) We must not use the atom bomb to protect American boys from annihilation at the hands of Communist China and Russia. That if we do we will be standing alone; that England and France will not be with us. He purports to represent France also.

(b) Admission of Communist China to the United Nations to be the next order of business, with Acheson's active assistance—with enough votes to allow the United States to save face by voting against such admission, but not using the veto.

(c) Practical withdrawal of the defense of Formosa.

Then, Mr. President, following all those matters, the deal will be, of course, that world war III will be stopped conditioned upon the recognition of Communist China by the United States and upon the withdrawal of the defense forces from Formosa. That, of course, is something calculated to strike into the hearts of many of our countrymen—that we can stop this terrible war by recognizing Communist China. It is a great temptation to lay before the mothers and fathers of this country.

WORLD WAR III WILL RESUME—UNITED STATES WITHOUT FRIENDS

Mr. President, nearly any war can be stopped by surrendering. Then after 6 months, a year, or 2 years, or a reasonable time, after we have expended large amounts of money in rehabilitation of Korea and other areas, the Communists will start the fight again, and in the real world war III we will be without Nationalist China and will be standing alone, without friends.

Both England and France refuse to endanger their Far East holdings, in the Malayan States and in Indochina, by joining us in an attack upon Communist China or upon Russia, who holds Manchuria.

SHOULD USE THE VETO

Mr. President, we should use the veto to prevent the recognition of Communist China which will prove another Yalta—and a further step in world-wide Communist domination.

Regardless of past errors and ghastly mistakes we should use any means at our command to stop the wanton slaughter of American boys in North Korea.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, there has been considerable discussion among Senators as to when the vote is expected to be had on the question of extension of rent control. I have spoken to the minority leader [Mr. WHERRY] and to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL]. In view of the fact that several Senators will be absent from the Senate tomorrow on important business, I wish to announce that it is my hope, and my purpose after the Senate convenes tomorrow, and a quorum call has been had, and after various preliminary matters have been disposed of, to ask unanimous consent that a vote on the joint resolution providing for extension of rent control be taken at 12 o'clock on Wednesday, or after the quorum call has been had on Wednesday, which probably will not be ended until 12:30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator to be making the statement so Members of the Senate may be informed of his intention.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes. It is my purpose to ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote on the joint resolution on Wednesday. Of course, if objection is made, a vote cannot be had on Wednesday. I repeat, that tomorrow I intend to ask that the joint resolution be voted on on Wednesday, after the convening of the Senate and, of course, after a quorum call has been made, which the rule requires.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. BRICKER. Does not the Senator believe it is possible to have a vote on the joint resolution tomorrow afternoon?

Mr. MAYBANK. No, Mr. President. I have just stated that many Senators will be absent tomorrow on official business. So it has been thought that perhaps it would be best that unanimous-consent request be made for a vote on the joint resolution on Wednesday.

Mr. BRICKER. Why does the Senator believe more Senators will be absent tomorrow than on any other day?

Mr. MAYBANK. I cannot answer the Senator's question. I have discussed the situation with the Senate minority leader [Mr. WHERRY] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], who have discussed it with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. They thought perhaps it would be better to vote on Wednesday.

Mr. BRICKER. Would it not be just as desirable to have the vote on Thursday? I wish to be away from the session of the Senate on Wednesday.

Mr. MAYBANK. No one is more appreciative than I am of the cooperation of the junior Senator from Ohio in the Banking and Currency Committee in connection with this subject. However, we have thought it best that a vote be had on Wednesday. If objection is made, a vote cannot be had on that day. My purpose in making the announcement is to assure Senators who have made inquiry, that a vote would not be had tomorrow.

Mr. BRICKER. Is the Senator willing to ask that the vote be had at a fixed hour on Thursday?

Mr. MAYBANK. I have no objection to that. It is necessary however, that a quorum call be had before that is done. I do not wish to ask for a quorum call this afternoon. It was my thought that after the quorm call has been had tomorrow, and after preliminary business has been transacted, I would ask unanimous consent that a vote be had on Wesdnesday. I have made that statement to the Senators to whom I have talked about the matter.

Mr. BRICKER. If objection is made to the vote being had on Wednesday, is the Senator willing to ask that it be had on Thursday?

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator is now saying that after the quorum call is had tomorrow he will present a unanimous-consent request that the vote be taken on Wednesday; that if objection is made, he will ask that it be had on Thursday. However, the Senator prefers that the vote be had on Wednesday.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes. The reason for my statement is that many Senators will be absent on important engagements tomorrow. My purpose was to notify all Senators that the vote would not be had tomorrow.

Mr. WHERRY. It will be agreeable to me, Mr. President, that tomorrow, after the quorum call has been had, the Senator from South Carolina present his unanimous-consent request. His purpose in making his statement today is to assure Senators that there will be no vote on the joint resolution tomorrow.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes. I wished to make the statement for the benefit of all Senators.

Mr. WHERRY. It is very considerate of the Senator from South Carolina to make the statement now so we may all be informed as to what is proposed to be done.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] wished to speak. If he does not wish to speak, I shall move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow.

Mr. CAIN. I should like first to inquire of the acting majority leader what the parliamentary situation is, and what he wishes to have done now.

Mr. MAYBANK. I appreciate the statement of my good friend the Senator from Washington. In view of the fact that the debate has been rather delayed, I would prefer to have the other Senators hear the distinguished Senator from Washington address us. I have assured him that we would not have a quorum call.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from South Carolina is very kind. Because, to my knowledge, no other Senator desires to speak on this question at length, I would prefer to offer my comments about the pending measure tomorrow.

Mr. MAYBANK. Very well.

LACK OF INFORMATION BY MEMBERS OF CONGRESS ON THE PRESENT SITUATION

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina permit me to take several minutes to read a letter, before request is made that the Senate take a recess?

Mr. MAYBANK. Certainly.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, about an hour ago the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], a very close friend of mine, came to me and said, in substance, "Senator, what are we going to do now? You sit on the one committee in the Senate, the Armed Services Committee, that ought to have some of the answers to the pressing questions of this day. What ought we and this country do?"

I responded in the only fashion in which I could respond; I said that as of this minute I only wish that I and other members of the committee, and Members of the Senate generally, as well, might have some satisfactory and reasonable answers, but we do not. I continued to relate, in a sentence or two, that I supposed I was no different than any other Senator, these days, in that our desks are simply overflowing with mail from worried constituents throughout the country. They write to advise us to see to it promptly that the Secretary of State is fired, or that the Secretary of State ought to be maintained in his office. They write, out of the urging of their own hearts, to say that it is their view that America ought to get out of Korea; or that America, through its commander in chief in the field, ought to be given authority to use the atom bomb. They write, as they ought to write, and as we would expect them to write, on every conceivable subject. In most instances there is no clear-cut answer, so far as the Senator from Washington is concerned, that he can send to satisfy their thirst for knowledge.

I told the Senator from Louisiana that in an effort to do as best I could with the mail which presently is coming from almost everywhere I had but the other day written a letter which I have asked my staff to send to any and every American who is so thoughtful as to write to me these days. The letter should, from my point of view, constitute only an interim response. The letter indicates one or two things which the junior Senator from Washington thinks should be done; but the letter does not maintain that the author of the letter, the Senator from Washington, thinks he knows best or conclusively what ought or can or must be done.

However, in an effort perhaps to be of some very small assistance to other Members of the Senate who find themselves as pressed with correspondence on these matters as I am, I shall read the letter, which I have sent to several hundred Americans, and which I shall send to others, although I hope I can improve upon the letter from day to day. I now read the letter:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
December 1, 1950.

DEAR SIR: I was grateful for your recent communication and will answer it as best I can. Since the Communist armies began their large-scale attacks, I, and most other Senators, have received thousands of letters and telegrams from patriotic, well-intentioned citizens all over the land. The very bulk of this mail prevents me from responding to any individual's thoughts or advice in detail.

My best and considered view is that America and the free world has never been so in trouble or so squarely confronted with the possibility of major and continuing losses on the field of battle. Others will disagree, but I believe that the United States is presently fighting for military, political, and economic survival.

It is not sufficient to the needs of the hour to criticize the past. Our joint responsibility and hope is to find a solution for the tragedy of the present.

The Congress, as I believe, wants to find a way to assist the administration in the conduct of the war, which I defined as being war on the day after hostilities began in Korea last June. Thus far neither the administration nor the United Nations have sought our advice or assistance. Members of the Congress have offered their advice to the administration and to the United Nations, but little of it has been taken.

As matters stand in Korea the situation is both impossible and fantastic. Tens of thousands of Americans and South Koreans and about twenty thousand troops from 50-odd nations from among the United Nations, our allies, are committed to bloody combat in Korea while their commander in chief, General MacArthur, has been denied the authority to strike at and destroy the enemy's supply and communication lines. Such a dilemma has never confronted an army in all of history.

My view is that we must let General MacArthur use every means and every weapon against the enemy or we must endeavor to entirely remove the United Nations forces from Korea. Whether this latter and possible step could be accomplished at this late date I am not qualified to say.

Some months ago I traveled broadly in Western Europe and the Near East in an effort to determine the military capacity, intentions and preparedness of our allies in Western Europe and the Near East. With no possible pride of authorship I told the Senate and the country on my return that the free world was totally unprepared to protect itself and that our lack of strength was a continuing and clear invitation for the forces of communism to attack us, in an effort to annihilate us, all over the world. Three months have gone by since this tour was completed and the free world is less well prepared to defend itself than was the case 90 days ago.

I am satisfied that the country has no appreciation of the danger which is upon us. We continue to debate, both in and out of the United Nations, while a ruthless enemy pursues his determination to crucify the world. The administration has not shared nearly all of its knowledge of this danger with our Nation. Some of us have used what little influence we possess to lay the facts of life before the Nation and in return we are often referred to as being isolationists, reactionaries, or reexaminists. Such allegations do not bother us as individuals but make us very sad because such charges help to minimize our effectiveness.

My only present and complete preoccupation is with Korea and other areas where war may likely break out at any minute. I can only do what I think must or can be done from day to day. As a member of the Armed Services Committee I have an opportunity to remain close to the military facts in Korea and elsewhere.

The imperative thing which ought to be done at once is for the President of the United States to tell America publicly where it stands. Until this is done, no comprehensive program will be agreed to by the Congress, because the Congress won't know what to do. The Congress can't manage, direct, or win the war. The Congress is only equipped to support and carry out a design for victory and eventual peace which is laid before the Congress by the Administration. Were this not so some of us would have taken matters into our own hands months ago. The fact is that we can talk, but unfortunately we cannot act on our own initiative.

Please write to me again whenever you feel so inclined. I will tell you what I think is going on at any time.

With regards which are very sincere and full of hope, I am,

Appreciatively yours,

HARRY P. CAIN.

Mr. President, I wish that I, as a Member of this body, could have written a much better, more factual, and more hopeful letter to those constituents of mine. I shall keep on trying to secure information and to work with others, in both parties, in hopes that we can soon lay before the American people a full and complete definition of where this Nation and our allies stand and how this Nation and our allies are going to extricate ourselves from a situation which, to say the least, is extraordinarily grave tonight.

THE KOREAN CRISIS

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator from Washington for his very timely bringing of that letter to the attention of the Congress.

I had hoped that more Members of the Senate today would give us the benefit of their thinking and their views with reference to the plight with which we find ourselves faced in Asia and the personal plight that the men who in Asia are carrying the flag for us find themselves in on the battlefield.

Mr. President, I am not a member of the Committee on Armed Services, nor am I a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I should like to express what I believe is the hope and wish of many other Members of this body who are not on either of those committees, namely, that we be given more light on the situation.

I have observed that in the past week or 10 days several members of those committees have, very properly, been brought into some very serious conferences. I hope all of them have been fully briefed regarding the situation. However, the Members of the Senate who do not serve on those committees do not have the advantage of that information, although the mail we receive from our constituents assumes that we know all the facts.

Our mail from home assumes that the Congress is setting the policies of this war, that we are determining the policies of the Nation. It is true that we are the policy-making branch of the Nation and our mail from home assumes that we are responsible, too, for policies in war. I am not seeking to dodge any of that responsibility, but I plead for further illumination as to the facts, harsh as they may be, because we are the ones to whom the people look, we are the ones whom they blame. Merely putting it on the basis where it belongs under our form of government, we are the ones who will be blamed, and I say we should therefore be fully informed and fully briefed. I think we ought to know the facts. We are told, "It would cause leaks, and everything would become known." That is one of the hazards, perhaps, of our form of government. But military authorities can withhold secret military facts, and at the same time keep us fairly well informed as to the basic conditions.

I certainly am not a military man, and I am not seeking to offer military advice; but from such light as I have before me, I think the day has long since arrived when we ought to strike communistic China with all the force and power we have; we ought to give the commander in Korea full power to strike with everything we have, in every way he can and I urge that we either strike in this manner or that we evacuate and get out of Korea.

It seems to me that it is without precedent, in all modern history, at least, to undertake a venture of this kind without the authority to go all the way; and I think we are reaping the fruits of this hybrid policy. It may be that we cannot evacuate; I do not know; but on the facts, I know we are already faced with such a situation that we shall have to strike in every way and with everything we have, even if it means war with China, or even with Russia. Our boys in Korea and Japan must be protected at once.

That is my thinking on the subject, and it is this point that I urge those who are making the decisions to consider seriously. The President of the United States, the United Nations to the contrary notwithstanding, is the Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces. I do not say that in criticism. I support the United Nations. I have been greatly encouraged by its accomplishments, but most of the men who are carrying the flag of the United Nations are from our Armed Forces, and I think the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces, is going to have to intervene there and to do it quickly. He must give the commands to strike with everything that we have, or we will merely have to say to the United Nations that we shall have to withdraw.

Mr. President, I have been concerned constantly as to why we are not using the Chinese Nationalist troops. There may have been very good reasons. I think there was sound logic back of many of the reasons which were given during the first part of this affair, for our not using those troops. The reason given was that probably their use would cause communistic China to enter the conflict. Mr. President, communistic China is now in it with all the striking power and all the fury at her command, the like of which I have never known before. I have understood that no reports more grave or serious have come to the Congress since George Washington sent his message from Valley Forge. But, whatever reasons there may have been for the failure to use the Chinese Nationalists, it seems to me those reasons have all long since gone by the board and have entirely disappeared from the picture. I think that either the Chinese Nationalists ought to be put into action, if they are willing, or we ought to be told the reason why they are not. I think it is a matter for the policy-making branch of the Government. We are entitled to know the reasons why. Upon my responsibility, and basing my conclusion on facts I have before me, I advocate the use of those troops.

I liked the expression used by the Senator from Washington that the world must know exactly where we stand, and our allies in the United Nations must know where we stand. But more than that, the American people need to know where we stand. I do not say this in any spirit of "I told you so"; not at all; but I am referring here to a short speech I made on the floor of the Senate on the 12th day of August 1950 in which I used these words:

Mr. President, this is a dark day in America now, but not caused altogether by the unfavorable news that comes from Korea. I have a confident feeling that the trend there will be reversed. The darkness of the hour is due to the lack of a policy and the lack of a plan that extends beyond Korea. The people want light from Washington. Mr. President, I repeat, the people of the United States will not long support an undeclared war that does not have a definite direction, a clear purpose, and an ultimate goal. We are supporting such a war now but that support will not long last, nor should it last long without a policy for which definite plans can be made and carried out. Without a clearly defined cause to fight for, made unmistakably plain to all of us, this war will soon grow sour and stale.

* * * * *

This is no time for soft words. We must have a definite, realistic, positive policy as to this war and our future protection. We do not have it now.

Mr. President, I renew the sentiments expressed in that brief speech, made more than 3 months ago. It was not spoken as prophecy. I am not speaking in terms of "I told you so," but the people of the United States whose boys are shedding the blood and providing the flesh and the bone on the frozen battlefields of Korea are crying out for an answer, and are asking "Why, oh, why?" They are willing to sacrifice. They are willing to fight. They are willing to die, if the cause is basically American. But we must have a statement as to our policy. We must know where we are, and I think we should strike with everything we have, or else evacuate. We should bring in the Chinese Nationalists. If such a policy is not sound, then the people of the United States ought to be told it is not and why it is not. I hope that we can and will move forward with a clearer understanding of the facts that we must face.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the reconvening of the Senate tomorrow and the obtaining of a quorum, and also after I shall have made a unanimous-consent request, the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] be permitted to offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution and to speak thereon for 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I dislike to make another unanimous-consent request, but the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] has requested me to try to get unanimous consent that on tomorrow, following the remarks of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], the Senator from Mississippi be recognized for 15 minutes. I make that unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, December 5, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 4 (legislative day of November 27), 1950:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, whose resources of wisdom and power are inexhaustible, grant that in these days, when truth and righteousness and justice are being violated, we may have the clear and commanding conviction that these virtues and forces can never be defeated or destroyed.

However great the temporary triumph of the enemy, however severe our sufferings and sacrifices may be, we are confident that our cause will be victorious.

We know that the struggle in which we are engaged is testing our material strength to the utmost but may we not fail to see that the more serious test is that of our morale.

Give us a calm and courageous spirit and an indomitable faith. May the least as well as the greatest, the weakest as well as the strongest, have a share in maintaining the Nation's morale and thus render valuable service to our beloved country in its time of desperate need.

We pray that Thou wilt guide with Thy Spirit the representatives of the freedom-loving nations as they take counsel together in an effort to resolve all international conflicts and reconcile all international estrangements.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 1, 1950, was read and approved.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION FOR DISABLED VETERANS — COMMUNICATION FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 728)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and ordered to be printed:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 4, 1950.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I wish to recommend action in the present session to renew the program of vocational rehabilitation for disabled veterans, which was in effect during and after World War II. Since the armed forces are now beginning to discharge men disabled in the current hostilities, renewal of these benefits has become a matter of urgency, warranting action before the present Congress adjourns.

During the last war, as at the present time, the first men to be released by the armed forces were those who had been wounded or otherwise disabled and were no longer able to serve on active duty. These men were, and are, entitled under permanent law to full medical treatment and to monthly compensation, varying with the degree of disability. In addition, disabled veterans of World War II were given help by the Government in gaining the qualifications needed for civilian employment. In some cases this meant completion of professional training interrupted by the war. In other cases old skills had to be brushed up or new skills acquired.

This program was authorized by Public Law 16 of the Seventy-eighth Congress. Under this law every disabled veteran who needed vocational rehabilitation in overcoming the handicap of his disability was enabled to undertake any type of education or training for which he had aptitude and interest. The colleges and universities and the trade and vocational schools all cooperated in the program, and many special courses were established. Arrangements were also made in many cases for training on the farm and on the job.

While the disabled veterans were in training their tuition was paid by the Government and the Government financed their subsistence and school supplies.

In this way thousands of disabled veterans were reequipped for jobs in civil life. In a great many cases these men were able fully to overcome the loss of earning power which had resulted from their disability. In all, more than 550,000 disabled veterans have participated in the rehabilitation program authorized by Public Law 16.

However, the benefits of Public Law 16 are not available to men who began their military service after July 25, 1947. This means that most of the men disabled during the current campaign in Korea will not receive the kind of rehabilitation benefits which were extended to the disabled veterans of the last war unless new legislation is enacted. I hope that such legislation will receive favorable action by the Congress before the close of this session.

Disabled veterans will need rehabilitation assistance first of all. Later they may also need other kinds of help in readjusting to civilian status. The next Congress will have an opportunity to give full consideration to their longer-range needs and to those of the able-bodied men, now in service, who will eventually be returned to civil life. In planning to meet these needs it will, of course, be essential to relate any new benefits to the readjustment problems which will actually face our future veterans. It will be necessary to review with care the experience gained in the veterans' readjustment programs after World War II. This will take time.

Meanwhile, however, there is no reason for delay in meeting the immediate needs of the disabled servicemen who are now being released by the Armed Forces.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

RAIL-SAFETY LEGISLATION

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, how many more lives must be sacrificed; how much more blood must be shed in railroad tragedies in this Nation before public officials are awake to their responsibilities in safeguarding the lives of the employees and the passengers in our rail transportation system?

We are greatly disturbed for a few days after each major rail accident and shout for investigations in search of the cause of each tragedy. But I have waited many years for some good to come from these probes. Too many people forget too fast, and after the public indignation caused by the horror of a major wreck subsides, so, too, does the interest of public officials in taking steps to prevent repetition of rail tragedies.

Too frequently have I felt compelled to address this House in pleas for legislative action to promote increased safety on our country's railroads. It was only a few short weeks ago, following a terrible train crash in Ohio in which 33 Pennsylvania National Guard men lost their lives, that I appealed for action on rail safety legislation which I have proposed.

I could list many accidents in recent years that point to the necessity for legislation to strengthen the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel the installation of additional safety equipment on our railroads. But I feel it is hardly necessary for me to again mention the long series of fatal wrecks, especially with the Long Island wreck fresh in our minds. In it 77 lives were lost. On Monday of last week, November 27, there occurred another accident which could have been a holocaust when a troop train crashed head on into a standing freight train at Screven, Ga. Twenty-three men were injured, but, thank God, none of the 200 GI's aboard the troop train were killed.

The Long Island wreck, the Ohio tragedy, the Georgia wreck, join the long list of accidents caused by speeding trains crashing into standing trains, or slowed-down trains, accidents which could be prevented by proper safety devices.

As I have said on many occasions on this floor—such accidents are tragic lessons on the need of two-way radio communications on all our railroads.

I have introduced legislation in the Congress for the past 4 years calling for the Interstate Commerce Commission to carry on a continuous study of communications systems, including radio and radar, with the object of applying to railroad operations those found to have real worth.

If, after investigation, the ICC finds it necessary in the public interest, it should be authorized to order any carrier to install within a specific time telephone, telegraph, radio, radar, inductive, or other systems to improve safety.

A subcommittee of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has incorporated my proposed legislation in a general rail safety measure. This Congress could devote some of the brief remaining time to enact such worthy legislation into law and in so doing perform a most worth-while service to the Nation.

I am convinced that the Long Island wreck, the Ohio tragedy, the Georgia accident, and many others, especially those in which stalled or slowed-down trains have figured would have been prevented by two-way radio communication systems.

I recognize the fact it is not possible to discount human failure as a cause of railroad accidents, but train radio and other automatic safety devices were invented to minimize such unavoidable possibilities.

Let us here in Congress fulfill our responsibility by spelling out the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission in ordering the installation on our railroads of the most modern safety devices.

COMMUNISM

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, do not call me a "lame duck." I expect to work even harder, one way or another, to help defeat communism, the New Deal-Fair Deal—raw deal for the American people—as long as I am permitted to remain on this good earth.

Under permission to extend my remarks, on Monday the 27th, I have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article on communism and the Un-American Activities Committee. My desire is not to offend anyone of this committee, for which I have a great deal of respect, but I would like to see more action by the committee in the Eighty-second Congress than there has been in the Eighty-first Congress. And this is no red herring. Does it not seem ridiculous that we are spending billions and billions of dollars in foreign countries to rid them of communism, while we have Communists in our own country and are not doing what we should to rid ourselves of them?

Many good, sound Republicans on the Un-American Activities Committee, Representatives NIXON, CASE, MUNDT, all have left the House and gone to the Senate. We need men like them on this important committee. At the opening of the Eighty-first Congress the New Deal tried to remove from the committee one of the best members because he did not follow the dictates of the Chief Executive and the leaders of the New Deal Party.

Now I make this proposal to the Republicans, who will have a voice in some changes in the Eighty-second Congress. I suggest to JOE MARTIN, CHARLIE HALLECK, LES ARENDS, CLARENCE BROWN, and other leaders of the Republican Party in the House, that they do everything possible to help rid America of communism. To that end, if there are no Republicans who really desire membership on the Un-American Activities Committee, I respectfully suggest to Republican House leaders that they support JOHN RANKIN, of Mississippi, who did such a fine job in creating and carrying on the duties of this committee, and then let the New Deal try to remove him. To me this would be a most meritorious move on the part of the Republicans. I strongly recommend it and hope that it will be given the consideration it deserves.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. VELDE asked and was granted permission to address the House for 30 minutes today, following the regular order of business and any other special orders heretofore entered.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may sit during general debate during the session of the House today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

COMPENSATION AND LEAVE BENEFITS FOR POST OFFICE CUSTODIAL EMPLOYEES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8711) relating to the compensation and leave benefits of officers and employees in the custodial service of the Post Office Department transferred to the General Services Administration under Reorganization Plan No. 18 of 1950.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

AMENDING SECTION 17 OF THE CONTRACT SETTLEMENT ACT OF 1944

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8883) to amend section 17 of the Contract Settlement Act of 1944 so as to authorize the payment of fair compensation to persons contracting to deliver certain strategic or critical minerals or metals in cases of failure to recover reasonable costs, and for other purposes.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

AMENDING THE RAILWAY LABOR ACT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 7789) to amend the Railway Labor Act and to authorize agreements providing for union membership and agreements for deductions from the wages of carriers' employees for certain purposes and under certain conditions.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

AID TO NEEDY AMERICAN NATIONALS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8927) to authorize aid to needy American nationals in connection with their repatriation from foreign countries, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

AMENDING SECTION 9 (A) OF THE TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1837) to amend the Trading With the Enemy Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY TO REVIEW THE RECORDS OF COMMISSIONED NAVAL AND MARINE OFFICERS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 780) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to review the records of commissioned naval officers who failed of advancement during the war, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HARE, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin, Mr. CUNNINGHAM, and Mr. FORD objected, and the bill was stricken from the calendar.

SEPARATION OF SUBSIDY FROM AIR-MAIL PAY

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 9184) to provide for the separation of subsidy from air-mail pay, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, a rule has been granted for the consideration of this bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

AMENDING SECTION 1205 OF TITLE XII OF THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1936, AS AMENDED

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 9715) to amend section 1205 of title XII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

NATURALIZED CITIZENSHIP TO ALL ALIENS HAVING A LEGAL RIGHT TO PERMANENT RESIDENCE

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9780) providing the privilege of becoming a naturalized citizen of the United States to all aliens having a legal right to permanent residence.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] kindly explain this bill?

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to remove racial restrictions in the naturalization of aliens who have a legal right to remain in the United States but cannot become citizens because of racial exclusion. This is the same bill that was passed by the House on two occasions, and subsequently passed over the veto of the President. The objectionable part of the bill has been removed because the restriction features that were in the bill as passed by the House have been included in the McCarran law and are now the law of the land.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Since this has already been passed over a Presidential veto, this bill in effect amends the present law.

Mr. WALTER. That is correct.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in my opinion this is no time to be passing legislation of this kind; it is of more far-reaching effect than the average Member realizes.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The pending request is that the bill be considered.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances, in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. ROOSEVELT (at the request of Mr. PRICE) was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. HOLIFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, in each to include extraneous material.

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in four instances, in each to include extraneous material.

Mr. WHITTINGTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include therein an address he delivered as president at the fifteenth annual convention of the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Association at New Orleans, La., on November 30, 1950.

Mr. KARST asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include therein an editorial from the Louisville Courier-Journal.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances and to include extraneous matter in each.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, and include editorials.

Mr. VURSELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. JONAS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune.

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances.

Mr. PLUMLEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. KEARNEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HARVEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials.

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two statements.

Mr. ENGLE of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution.

Mr. CROSSER (at the request of Mr. PRIEST) was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an address.

Mr. STEFAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an address.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, in my request last week to extend my remarks the extension ran one-third of a page over the amount permitted under the rules, the estimate of the Public Printer being $191.34. I renew my request, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the cost.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

EXCESS-PROFITS TAX ACT OF 1950

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 872 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 days, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment. No amendment shall be in order to said bill except amendments offered by the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, and said amendments shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Amendments offered by the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means may be offered to any section of the bill at the conclusion of the general debate, but said amendments shall not be subject to amendment. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, and pending that I yield myself 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, today we begin debate under this rule on an important piece of legislation designed to raise an estimated additional $4,000,000,000 annually in taxes. The rule is a closed one like all other rules for the consideration of tax legislation. Both the Democratic and Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee who appeared before the Rules Committee on Friday agreed that this was the only type of rule that could be granted for the consideration of this bill. It provides not to exceed 2 days of general debate with only such amendment as may be offered by the committee. There is, therefore, no necessity of discussing the merits of the rule, and I take it that it will be adopted at the end of the hour provided without dissenting votes. Neither shall I debate the merits of the particular method provided in this bill for raising this additional revenue. I realize there are two schools of thought as to how this money should be raised; but not being a tax expert I must confess that I am not competent to discuss the merits of these two proposals. I do know, however, that there is an urgent necessity for raising additional revenue and at the conclusion of the debate I shall vote for the bill as amended. When we consider the fact that this Government is in the red almost $250,000,000,000 and that there is now before the Appropriations Committee a request of the President for an additional $18,000,000,000 which will no doubt be appropriated at this short session, it is unthinkable that we should not increase the revenue of the Government. Moreover, in view of the additional fact that corporate and other profits are at an all-time high, with the prospect of those profits increasing as we step up our mobilization program, sound business judgment, as well as patriotism, make it imperative that we take this step.

Mr. Speaker, as one who possesses a fair knowledge of American history and with no desire to appear dramatic, but, rather, impelled by the motive of sincerity and realism, I say to you that in my humble judgment this young Republic faces the greatest crisis in its history. The Soviet Union under the leadership of Josef Stalin and his henchmen, who control the destinies of the Russian people, have succeeded in causing the leaders of the Chinese Communist regime to wage war upon us and other members of the United Nations. They have, also, succeeded in depriving free peoples of many other war-ridden countries of their liberties by setting up puppet governments subservient only to the will of Moscow. This has all been possible by the use of propaganda for the false pagan philosophy of communism.

We and the United Nations are now faced with the problem of either moving out of Korea and thereby losing face in a section of the world where face means so much or else confronting the real danger of being forced to wage an exhaustive and doubtful war against a normally friendly people 7,000 miles from our shores. Either horn of the dilemma is most distasteful.

Today, Mr. Attlee, claiming to speak for all of Western Europe, is conferring with President Truman. It is to be assumed that the President will have the benefit of the advice and counsel of those entrusted with our policy making in the diplomatic and military fields. Press reports indicate that Mr. Attlee, like Mr. Chamberlain, who occupied a similar position in the events which led up to World War II, favors further appeasement of Stalin, even as Mr. Chamberlain attempted to appease Hitler at Munich. Of one thing we may be sure, however, and that is, regardless of our having twice come to the rescue of France and England in World War I and II and of all of the financial assistance we have furnished them in the rehabilitation of their countries following those wars, that Mr. Attlee in Washington will be thinking and speaking of and for the Socialist Governments of England and France, and that it will, therefore, be very necessary that President Truman and his advisers take the necessary precautions to see that the interest, the security and the future of the United States be protected.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself seven additional minutes.

Surely those who represent us here in this fateful conference will be realistic enough to diplomatically point out these things to Mr. Attlee and his advisers, and to remind them, moreover, that we are all in a common boat; that our individual interests must be subordinated to the common cause; that America is not only unwilling but unable to furnish both finances and men to defend Asia and Europe on two fronts; that if Europe wants us to remain in Korea, Europe must furnish more than a token force of manpower—on the other hand, that if England and France and the rest of Europe expect America to continue financing them, they must be prepared to largely furnish the manpower for the armies on the European front; that this is no time for bickering about arming and enlisting the assistance of Western Germany; and, finally, that if Western Europe is unwilling to take a firm stand and to fight if necessary in order to stem the further tide of Russian aggression and to make the necessary sacrifice therefor, the United States is in a better position, due to its geographical location, to play the appeasement role than either France or England. Permit me to say to my colleagues assembled here that I realize the impossibiilty of the Congress, as such, to write the program or to make the necessary decisions so gravely impending in this hour of world crisis. Under our democratic process, the conferences of diplomacy and the strategy are of necessity left with the President and his advisers in the diplomatic and military fields. That there have been mistakes made by this administration in both fields I am among the first to admit. In fact, some of you will recall that ever since my return from a study of conditions in Europe, and particularly in Russia, more than 5 years ago, I have been urging a realistic and firm policy in dealing with Russia, but no good purpose can now be served with an I-told-you-so harangue.

It is now beside the point whether the mistake was made in selecting Korea as the point at which to call Russia's hand. It is beside the point now as to whether a mistake was made in going north of the thirty-eighth parallel after driving the North Koreans out of South Korea. The fact that all of Russia's late allies in World War II have followed an erroneous policy of appeasement from Yalta until Korea is, also, a moot question.

The next few days should largely determine what our future course shall be. Once that course is decided upon as a result of these conferences, there are some things that you and I as Members of the Congress of the United States can and should do. For, regardless of the outcome of these conferences, we realize now, if we have never known before, that Russia is bent upon world revolution and world domination and that the struggle may well last for many years to come.

First. We must obliterate the aisle that serves as a line to divide the Democrats and Republicans in these two Chambers of the Congress. We must stand together as Americans with no political bickering over party lines; for, surely, if we lose this fight, there will be but one party in this country as there is in Russia and her satellites.

Second. We must see to it that there is, as nearly as is humanly possible, an equality of sacrifice on the part of our people in the long years ahead. There must be no slacking. There must be no business as usual. There must be no politics. There must be no millionaires made out of the sweat and blood of our boys. There must be no crippling strikes in our industrial production. There must be no Harry Bridgeses and John L. Lewises to sabotage the efforts of our warriors.

Third. As distasteful as controls are to a free people we must become realistic and provide for all-out controls of our economy. We should see to it that these controls are across the board, remembering our experience in the last two wars, that one segment of the economy cannot be controlled without the other. Wages, prices, and inflation must be controlled. We know that wage controls are not looked upon with favor by this administration, but I repeat that one commodity cannot be controlled and the other left untouched. If the administration does not see fit to use the machinery which the Congress has authorized for that purpose, then we can mandatorily provide for such controls.

Fourth. We can and must see that the necessary funds are forthcoming for the financing of the necessary guns, planes, bombs, and ships.

Fifth. We must see to it that all of the resources of this great country are channeled into a wartime economy in an all-out effort to make of this country a military fortress. For, surely, all of us must now realize that firmness and strength are the only language that the Kremlin understands.

Sixth. Our internal security must be further supplemented and alerted. There must be no further political affiliation in this country with the leftists, the pinkos, and the Communists.

Seventh. If your apprehensions of the situation are as grave as mine, then I am sure that you, on both sides of the aisle, will agree with me that there is no place in the program for either so-called progressive or socialistic experiments in the Nation's economy. The so-called more abundant life theory must yield to the practical realism of the dangers to survival. If anyone's standard of living, whether in this or foreign countries, is to be elevated, let it be deployed to your and my boys and the millions of other sons of America who are and will be called upon to bare their breasts to the common enemy.

Mr. Speaker, if that terrible weapon of destruction, the atomic bomb, must be dropped, let it be dropped at headquarters, at the Kremlin, and not upon the heads of the puppet satellites, who only do their master's bidding.

Finally, my colleagues of the American Congress, I still adhere to the theory that the masters of the Russian people still do not want any all-out war. They are no better prepared for such a devastating spectacle than are we. They are still about their task of bringing about chaos, confusion, infiltration, and sabotage, using the puppets of their satellite governments to affect their end—world revolution. Of course, they will fight if necessary, but not as long as they can pull strings and gain the same end through these puppet governments. I repeat what I have pointed out on this floor on several occasions heretofore that we cannot afford to permit Russia to always call the signals and permit ourselves to be spread out so thinly all over the world that we will be strong enough at no point to defend ourselves and our cause. It is to be hoped that out of these conferences a definite political as well as military policy will be agreed upon. But, again, regardless of what those decisions are, there is nothing to offer the people of the United States and free peoples everywhere but the offer made the British people in another great crisis when Winston Churchill, the greatest Britisher of them all, told his people that he had nothing to offer them but "blood and sweat and tears." Surely we in America, living under the most perfect embodiment of human government ever conceived by the minds of men, with a glorious heritage and rich patriotic ancestry, will arise to meet the occasion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi has explained the rule. It is a closed rule. No one but the Committee on Ways and Means can offer amendments. One motion to recommit is permitted, and it is my understanding that such a motion will be offered.

We have no objection to the rule, but the members of the Committee on Rules were considerably surprised when the members of the Committee on Ways and Means came before our committee without a printed bill; and they came in with most of us having the knowledge that they had held but 20 hours of executive hearings on this bill, which consists of 146 pages and has scores and scores of sections. Many tax experts were denied the opportunity to be heard.

There is no disposition on the part of any of us to fight the rule, but I hope the Committee on Ways and Means will in the future come in with bills that at least they themselves have read.

We all know that we face the worst crisis in our history. I think we are all agreed that something must be done to halt inflation. We all agree that something must be done to bring in additional revenue. Something must be done to take excess profits out of war.

I understand the minority is going to offer a motion to recommit which will provide for obtaining more revenue than this bill and will give more equity to the smaller corporations, the small corporations that have been recently formed with the purpose of helping the war effort.

Like my good friend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER], I want to touch briefly on the crisis facing us today and which I believe, and which I am sure you believe, is probably the worst in the history of our country. Two or three hundred thousand of our boys are fighting in Korea. We are now bringing in a tax bill that will be confiscatory in its effect on the American people.

I am sure all of you will recall that when the United Nations was brought forth certain remarks were made in the other body, and I personally in the last few days have read those remarks, to the effect that in the formation of the United Nations all nations would have certain responsibilities. When anybody started an aggression we would have 50 nations under 50 flags fighting side by side on the front. Yes; we remember the gentlemen in the other body coming forth with the statements during the debate on the United Nations that we were all going to fight the aggressor with equality. One nation was not to furnish 50 men while all the other nations furnished 1 man. That is what is happening in Korea today.

So I say to you that the least this Congress of the United States can demand, when we are taxing our people to the limit of their ability to pay, or more, is that these nations for which we have done so much shall share this burden in a much higher degree than they have up to this moment.

We must not let ourselves forget that the Chinese people since times immemorial have been the best fighters in the world.

I am sure you all have read some Chinese history. History shows us that from the time of the Mongolians and from the time of Genghis Khan the Chinese have been fighters. That is why when the Red Army of Russia started to fight against the National Government they went north of the Great Wall of China and got the best troops. As you go south in China you find those people are not as good a fighter. Had the Reds in China started in southern China and let Gen. Chiang Kai-shek have the fighters north of the Great Wall they would have had more difficulty. But that was not what took place.

So I ask you now in all fairness to consider. Right now there are about two or three hundred thousand of our boys in Korea. They are going to fight against a million of the best fighters in the world, and they are the Chinese people north of the Great Wall. There is no question about that. Right now when the representatives of these other governments are coming here, like Mr. Attlee and so on, I would like to see this happen. I would like to see the United Nations and the Security Council say to Russia: "Now, we are going to give you a hearing. Many of us believe that you are the aggressor. You are a member of the United Nations and a member of the Security Council. We are going to give you an opportunity to prove to us that you are not the aggressor and that you have nothing to do with this. If you cannot convince us, then you are certainly going to be read out of the United Nations."

The very idea of Russia having that great veto power and with more power than any other nation with a preferential status in the United Nations when most of the members of the United Nations say that they are the aggressors. To think that they still have that coveted position which is denied to all other nations. So I say that within the next few days the Congress of the United States in no uncertain terms should demand that the Russian Government come here and prove that they are not the aggressor nation. If they cannot prove that I think they should be read out of the United Nations. To me it is folly to have a nation which is supposed to stop aggression actually being the instrument of aggression. So I say in conclusion I believe the American people as long as they are paying these tremendous taxes toward the United Nations should see the United Nations play a bigger part in this matter in order to eliminate the slaughter of perhaps 200,000 of our young men before the zero weather in Korea is over.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the events of the past few weeks have demonstrated one fact or truth, and that is that to permit the United Nations to formulate our foreign policy will prove our ruin. The policy of appeasement which we have been following for the past few years is responsible for the plight in which we now find ourselves. Therefore, I trust that the conferences that are to take place between the President and the representatives of the British Empire will not result in any further appeasement of Russia through sacrificing what is left of Nationalist China.

Mr. Speaker, this rule is to make in order the tax bill, and what we have said is, more or less, irrelevant to the question before us. In strengthening and supporting our armed services we must make tremendous expenditures. We have to have the money with which to pay the freight, and in view of the emergency before us I am for adopting a tax bill as quickly as possible and sending it to the Senate so that that body may work its will upon it in time to get a fair law before the present Congress dies.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 14 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN].

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, here we go again. History will prove the statement I am about to make—that every time Mr. Truman and this administration get messed up, which they are most of the time, they simply ask for more money, more appropriations by the billions. We appropriate, then, of course, they say, "Now we must tax. We must tax the big fellow. We must tax the rich." The facts are that the ultimate consumer pays the whole bill in the final analysis regardless of who we try to soak. Who are we taxing if we pass this bill? We are taxing the ultimate consumer. And who are they? Well the white-collar worker and the blue denim worker plus the retired folks pay approximately 60 percent of the taxes. The farmer pays about 30 percent; and all the rest of us, including the corporations and all business and industry in America, plus folks like you and I, pay the balance of about 10 percent. Remember the ultimate consumer is the only fellow who cannot pass his tax load on to the other guy, so the ultimate consumers pay the entire tax bill in the final analysis. Oh, yes, we are going to tax the rich. England tried that. But the Socialist Party had to tell the common man in England about a year ago that there were no more rich left to tax, and so the common man, the little fellow, the laboring man, the consumers must pay the bill from now on. This party in power, the New Deal, the Fair Deal, the Socialists, or whatever you care to call them has never had a cure for anything except to spend more billions, go deeper into the red, then tax, tax. That is all they know. They have no conception of how to properly run a Republic such as ours, and the American people have finally awakened to that fact. Spend and spend; elect and elect. Well my colleagues that day is over. The day of electing spendthrifts is over. The President has asked us for $17,000,000,000 more for defense for the fiscal year 1951. I suppose we will do about as we have done before. Give it to the reckless wasters to spend, for what?

Will they spend 82 percent for housekeeping and only 18 percent for armaments, as is the case with every dollar Congress appropriated for national defense since VJ-day? That is tragic and a crime of the highest order. I pray God that those responsible will finally be brought to the bar of justice and that no more of that kind of business will be tolerated even by the spenders and wasters in power, or is that too much to expect even while our boys are dying in Korea for lack of fighting tools, and reinforcements from our friends across the seas who talk nice about us when their hands are out, but who forget when the going is tough as it is for our boys in Korea. God help them.

Mr. Speaker, the boys who survive this war will have to pay and pay and pay, for they will be consumers too. How tragic. What a disgraceful showing. One of these fine days we will tax the homes, and the farms, and the businesses away from American people just as sure as we are sitting in this House of Representatives today, because every nation in the world that traveled the full length of the spending, wasting road we have traveled at breakneck speed during 16 of the last 18 years have all come to ruin and destruction, socialism, communism, endless strife and war. After we spend ourselves into complete bankruptcy—and uncontrolled inflation, who, I ask, is going to be the great savior of this world as far as human beings are concerned? No nation can then look to us to save them as we are trying to do; no nation in the world will have anywhere to go for aid and protection or to give them bread to save them from communism. Mr. Speaker, the thing we should do instead of passing this bill is to send this bill back to committee and then pass a bill to rescind about $4,000,000,000 of nondefense appropriations that we have already appropriated for the fiscal year 1951. We could go through the nondefense appropriations we have already made for 1951 and find at least $4,000,000,000 that could and should be eliminated under present conditions. But of course the spenders in control will not do that; they will keep on appropriating and taxing and by so doing we will ruin this great free America of ours just as sure as night follows day.

Now let us take a look at Korea. There are 60 nations who are members of the United Nations; we have a war going on in Korea under the sponsorship of the United Nations. According to the newspapers the American casualties are running 200 to 1 for all the other 59 nations combined.

Mr. Speaker, the time is here, in fact past due, when the Congress must speak up. You may say we cannot do anything about it, we have a Commander in Chief who runs the show. Well, there are a lot of things the Congress can do. If necessary, we can impeach the President of the United States. That is still our prerogative.

President Truman has told Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek that we do not want his fighting men to help our men in Korea, because the Chinese Communists would not like it. We disarmed Japan so they cannot fight unless we help them get the tools to fight with, and we have not done that, even though Japan could raise a fighting force of over a million men quickly.

Mr. Speaker, the day has come when we have to do several things. We have got to tell the President of the United States that he will have to ask Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek to send his troops into Korea to help us; then also help arm Japan; then we must tell the rest of our vocal friends in United Nations to either put up or shut up, to either get over there with their fighting men in numbers a great deal more than a token force or we will pull our men out of Korea. Anyone who has an ounce of common sense should know by this time that our boys are being slaughtered over there because they are up against terrific odds that they cannot match.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe Congress must assert itself in no uncertain terms, and do it now, because certainly Mr. Truman, Mr. Acheson, Mr. Lattimore, and their kind have made a mess of the international problem. Oh, some may say, these are times when we should not criticize, we should unite.

The American people feel now that it is too bad we did not have more fight right here on the floor of Congress years ago.

If we had even slung a few fists here in Congress years ago, and knocked a few heads together downtown, to knock a little common sense into some heads, it is very possible that our boys would not be fighting today in Korea, losing their heads and their lives. But again we are now told we must be nice while our boys fight and die on foreign soil for the third time in 33 years. What say you America?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order the consideration of a tax bill—the desperate plight of Americans in Korea demands not alone its consideration, but a decision at the moment far more important.

We must speak straight to one another, for we share an unequaled responsibility. We are at war—no other word can rightfully describe the struggle of which our American troops are now engaged. We are at war with communism and its evil forces throughout the world. Tens of thousands of fine Americans have been committed to battle. They have and are fighting with a valor and gallantry unexcelled in the annals of war. At this moment our troops are in a desperate and serious military situation, and immediate action is demanded. The lives of American troops and those of our allies committed with us are precious beyond measure. At this moment let us determine that the full power, the full might, and the full strength of our great country shall be committed immediately to their aid and assistance. The luxury of half war and half peace can no longer be ours. We can ill afford at this time to re-create the past or to project our thinking into the far future. The immediate task of relieving our troops of their imminent peril is our job of the moment. We cannot sit idly by while so few make so many sacrifices. Let us from this moment forward and for so long a period as a single American life in uniform is periled by combat, dedicate ourselves and our resources to the fullest extent. Each of us, Democrat or Republican, is first an American—this is an American Congress. No one asks an American that he yield his conscience and his thought. The circumstances of today demand the fullest measure of all Americans united in a common action to back up our soldiers in Korea with every resource at our command. Let us conduct ourselves as Americans, not as partisan politicians.

The price of liberty and freedom has never been cheap. Americans have faced crisis and overwhelming odds many times and have achieved victory because we believe and stand for decent principles and precepts. We are and shall always remain stronger than any slave under any Communist dictatorship. Momentary victory may be theirs—but it will be short lived.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud that the Democratic and Republican Parties in Congress are composed of Americans. Let the world take notice here and now that we shall assume all of the responsibility consistent with victory in our present undertaking. Whatever may be the failures of our allies, the full might and forces of the United States of America is behind our boys in Korea. If they retreat, they do so with the knowledge that soon they will go forward to win, and we pray that our sacrifices here will be equal in small measure to the greatness of theirs.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYLE. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. First may I compliment the gentleman on his coolness in this crisis. Some of us speak without using their best judgment.

Let me reiterate what I said a few moments ago. Some have even gone so far as to suggest that we drop a bomb on the Kremlin, even while Russia is a brother member in the United Nations and officially committed to stop aggression just as much as is the United States or any other Nation. So I compliment the gentleman that he has not made that kind of suggestion, at a time when Russia is a member of the United Nations.

I think that within the next few days the United Nations should bring Russia before them and find out whether it is truly a member of the United Nations and intends to stop their aggression. Until this is done, I should dislike very much to see them start dropping bombs on Moscow.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9827, with Mr. WALTER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the House for consideration, H. R. 9827, is designed to raise additional revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax.

It is never easy to prepare nor popular to present a bill increasing taxes or imposing new taxes. However, regardless of how difficult or unpopular it may be, it becomes the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means to prepare and present bills increasing revenue when the fiscal needs of the Government require such action.

There are two major reasons why the pending bill is now before the House.

First, revenue requirements have greatly increased since the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1950, which increased income taxes on individuals by $2,500,000,000 and on corporations by $1,500,000,000. Last week, the President requested an additional $18,000,000,000 for the military and atomic-energy programs.

The second reason is section 701 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1950, which reads as follows:

(a) The House Committee on Ways and Means and the Senate Committee on Finance are hereby directed to report to the respective Houses of Congress a bill for raising revenue by the levying, collection, and payment of corporate excess-profits taxes with retroactive effect to October 1, or July 1, 1950, said bill to originate as required by article I, section 7, of the Constitution. Said bill shall be reported as early as practicable during the Eighty-first Congress after November 15, 1950, if the Congress is in session in 1950 after such date; and if the Congress is not in session in 1950 after November 15, 1950, said bill shall be reported during the first session of the Eighty-second Congress, and as early as practicable during said session.

The conference report on the Revenue Act of 1950, containing the provision I have just read, was adopted on September 22 by overwhelming majorities in both Houses. In the House of Representatives the vote was 328 to 7, and there was so little opposition in the other body that it was passed without a roll call.

H. R. 9827 is the response of the Committee on Ways and Means to the mandate that an excess-profits tax bill be reported as early as practicable during this Congress.

Charges have been made that this legislation is the result of political expediency. I can only speak for myself in denying such an allegation, and I should never, myself, presume to question the motives of my colleagues—especially when all members of our committee but one, and all Members of the House but seven who were recorded voted for the legislation in which the decision to enact an excess-profits tax on corporations was made.

It has also been asserted that the pending bill was hastily conceived and ill-prepared. These are the facts:

First. The amendment directing the committee to prepare an excess-profits tax was a substitute for a floor amendment in the other body to enact an excess-profits tax without committee hearings or other committee consideration. At that time, I conferred with responsible tax leaders of the other body who advised me that an excess-profits tax would have been added to the bill on the floor, but for the assurances of early separate consideration of an excess-profits tax.

Second. On September 23, the next day after the final passage of the Revenue Act of 1950 directing the committee to report out an excess-profits-tax bill, I called a meeting of the Committee on Ways and Means to work out our schedule for preparing such an excess-profits-tax bill. It was agreed at the meeting that we should have our staff begin work immediately and that the committee would return promptly after the election to begin our hearings.

Third. Immediately I directed the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and requested the Secretary of the Treasury to have his staff, to cooperate in a careful and thorough study of an excess-profits tax on corporations in order that we might have information available to the Committee on Ways and Means when we reassembled on November 15 to begin work on this subject. The staffs promptly began their work and conducted a series of conferences with various groups representing all segments of industry in order to obtain first-hand information on the problems involved.

Fourth. Starting November 15, a week after the election and 2 weeks before Congress reconvened, by sitting morning and afternoon and sometimes in continuous session throughout the day, hearings were scheduled and completed in approximately 1 week. Although witnesses were limited in the scope and length of their testimony, everyone who asked to appear was scheduled and members had full opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses. The testimony of the 100 witnesses who appeared and the statements filed have been bound in a volume of nearly 1,000 pages, which is available to the Members of the House.

Fifth. After the conclusion of the hearings, with but an intervening day for Thanksgiving, the committee began executive sessions on November 24, which were not concluded until last Friday afternoon with the reporting of this bill. During these sessions we have had the benefit of the invaluable assistance and experience of not only our own staff and the staff of the Treasury Department but that of the extremely able draftsmen in the Office of the House Legislative Counsel.

I believe, therefore, that our committee has complied fully with the legal mandate to report out an excess-profits-tax bill as early as practicable. As I have indicated, more than 2 months have been devoted by our staff and nearly 3 weeks have been consumed by the full committee in the study of excess-profits taxation, which is the sole subject of this measure, whereas other tax bills have dealt with several different kinds of taxation. It is now for the House to determine what action to take in dealing with this very important problem of the taxation of excess profits of corporations.

One of my good friends of the minority has been quoted in the press as saying:

> Psychologically, this tax bill is a wonderful piece of political machinery. * * * But I defy any business in the country to operate under it.

Now, I have never been considered hostile to business. In fact, upon occasions I have been criticized as being too friendly in support of legislation helpful to business. I do think it significant that there was no testimony before our committee that a single business had failed as a result of the excess-profits tax enacted in World War I or World War II.

I have always considered the interest of business and Government as mutual and reciprocal. Government relies heavily upon the profits of business for revenue. On the other hand, the life of business depends upon the protection it receives from a strong, soundly financed Government.

In preparing the pending bill the committee has drawn extensively upon previous experience under excess-profits-tax laws which were imposed during World War I and World War II. Our staff has made a thorough study of this experience, and recommended, and our committee adopted, a number of adjustments and safeguards to provide a milder and more moderate bill. Although this bill, H. R. 9827, in basic outline, follows the excess-profits-tax law in effect in World War II, since corporations would have the option of either a credit based on average earnings or invested capital, whichever results in the lower tax, specific provisions have been made for new businesses, growing corporations, regulated public utiilties, and corporations mining strategic minerals.

REVENUE EFFECT

The pending bill would at current levels of corporate profits yield about $3,000,000,000 a year and additional revenue can be expected if corporate profits continue to increase. Our committee believed that it was safer to proceed on the side of caution in avoiding too sudden an impact on corporate businesses which must provide our Armed Forces with much of the essential munitions and other equipment.

MAJOR PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

A. Rate of tax: The rate of tax would be 75 percent of adjusted excess-profits net income with an over-all rate limitation on income and excess-profits taxes of 67 percent. That is, no corporation would pay a total of more than 67 percent of its net income in Federal taxes and only a few of the most prosperous ones would pay that much. This compares with an 85½ percent excess-profits-tax rate in effect at the end of World War II, and an over-all ceiling of 72 percent.

B. Minimum credit: In lieu of the specific exemption of $10,000 provided under the World War II law, the pending bill would provide a minimum credit of $25,000. In other words, corporations with net income of less than $25,000 a year would pay no excess-profits tax.

C. Invested capital credit: Corporations which find it more favorable to use the invested capital method of computing their excess-profits-tax credit would compute their credit as follows:

On amounts paid in for stock and retained earnings up to $5,000,000, a rate of 12 percent would be allowed instead of the 8 percent during World War II. On amounts between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000, a rate of 10 percent would be allowed as compared with the World War II rate of 6 percent; and on such capital over $10,000,000, a rate of 8 percent would be provided under this bill as contrasted with a 5-percent rate under the World War II tax. In addition, the entire amount of interest paid on borrowed capital would be allowed as a deduction, and an extra allowance of one-third of the interest paid would be granted.

D. Average earnings credit: Corporations would be allowed to select three out of four best years in the 1946 to 1949 base period, and in determining their average earnings any deficit in the three best years could be raised to zero. The comparable provision in the World War II excess-profits-tax law were much less liberal.

The actual credit would be 85 percent of the earnings in the three best years of the base period, which still would exempt from excess-profits tax an average level of corporate profits considerably greater than during World War II.

E. Additions to capital after the base period: Under the present bill, both taxpayers using the average earnings credit and taxpayers using the invested capital credit would be permitted to increase their credits for net additions to investment made after the end of the base period.

F. General relief provisions: Under the World War II law, provision was made for general relief in hardship cases, and more specific rules for accomplishing the same purpose have been written into the pending bill.

G. New corporations: An alternative average earnings credit would be available to new corporations commencing business after 1945, consisting of the industry rate of return on invested capital in the base period.

H. Small growing corporation: Small corporations with total assets of not more than $20,000,000 at the beginning of the base period and with a higher volume of business in 1948 and 1949 than in 1946 and 1947, would be permitted to use an alternative credit consisting of either 1949 earnings or the average of 1948 and 1949 earnings.

I. Effective date: Section 701 of the Revenue Act of 1950 directed the Committee on Ways and Means to make the excess profits tax bill effective either October 1, 1950, or July 1, 1950. The pending bill is drafted to apply to corporate profits earnings after June 30, 1950.

CONCLUSION

In normal times, I would not favor an excess profits tax law—but these are not normal times. This may, in fact, be the greatest emergency this Nation has ever faced. It may require the drastic revision of personal lives and Government activities. Our boys have been called to the service of our country. They must be provided with the needed munitions and equipment.

NEED FOR RIGID ECONOMY

The weight of military expenditures underscores the imperative necessity for complete elimination of nonessential Federal expenditures and for cutting to the bone even normally necessary Federal expenditures unrelated to the defense effort. Under all the circumstances, it would seem only fair and just that we should call upon the corporate businesses, though the taxation of excess profits derived from the defense program, to carry a little heavier load than those not enjoying such profits.

To those who contend that an excess-profits tax would encourage wastefulness and extravagance on the part of businessmen, I answer that I have a higher estimate of the patriotism of the corporate officials of our country. Those able to pay taxes to help provide the needed munitions and equipment—those making excess profits—should not only feel it their duty but their privilege to contribute to their Government when our national security is at stake. While there have been other occasions during my service in Congress when our liberty and freedom have been threatened, the present situation indicates that our national safety may now be in greater danger than ever before. I have every confidence that the businessmen of the country will be willing to join once again in sharing substantially heavier tax burdens to strengthen, preserve, protect, and defend our sacred and priceless heritage.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DEANE. I would like to take this opportunity to express my personal appreciation of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the dean of our North Carolina delegation, for the splendid statement which he has just made.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I thank my friend for his most generous words.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means if it is the plan of the committee, so far as he can see at the moment, to keep this formula in operation for the next, say, 5 or 10 years, or does the committee have in mind revising it after we get a little bit further into this new over-all program?

Mr. DOUGHTON. My good friend knows that the Congress will be constantly in session as long as this Government stands, under the Constitution, and that any time a termination of this law is expedient, or a modification of the law is demanded by changing conditions, why, of course, the Congress would deal with it then. This emergency may continue many, many years. We hope it will not. But we are very much alarmed about the situation, and to provide a termination date now when we do not know anything about the probable termination of this emergency, I feel would not be the safe thing to do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What I had in mind was this. Everyone, substantially, knows who is going to constitute the next Congress. We certainly know, if we know anything, that many additional billions of dollars of revenue will have to be raised in one way or another. I think we know, if we know anything, that this is not a short-term proposition that we are heading into now. My concern is this: Does the Committee on Ways and Means, as it is constituted, looking forward to the next 2 years, have in mind letting this remain, if it becomes law, as an approach from an excess-profits-tax standpoint, or do they have in mind, perhaps, revamping the whole revenue-gathering program sometime during the next 12 to 18 months?

Mr. DOUGHTON. There is no doubt in my mind, although I cannot speak for the committee, but that we will have to take another careful look at the entire tax structure in the next Congress. Of course, membership on the committee changes from one Congress to another, and conditions change. In dealing with our grave tax problem, which our committee must do, we shall need to know, first, the fiscal needs of the Government, as determined by the Committee on Appropriations. We have no control over them, but we do the best we can to meet the fiscal needs of our Government.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 35 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, on November 15 President Truman submitted to the Ways and Means Committee his recommendations for excess-profits-tax legislation. For 6 days thereafter our committee was engaged in limited public hearings on the merits of that proposal.

It became quite obvious at the outset of the hearings that the President's fiscal advisers were not in full accord with his recommendations. The Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, chief spokesman for the President, was openly accused of lukewarm support and insincerity by one of the major proponents of an excess-profits tax, namely, the CIO.

When the Republican minority on the committee sought the viewpoints of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and of the excess-profits-tax counsel regarding the President's proposal the Democratic majority voted down the request.

Obviously, our Democratic colleagues feared that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and also the excess-profits-tax counsel would show as little enthusiasm for the proposal as did Secretary Snyder.

When the Republicans sought to consider other methods to finance our defense efforts we were also voted down by the Democratic majority.

The position was taken erroneously by the Democratic majority that the committee had a mandate to report out only the type of excess-profits tax recommended by the administration, regardless of whatever adverse effect such a type of tax might have on the national economy and our preparedness program.

And, so, Mr. Chairman, the hearings were confined to testimony on the type of excess-profits tax recommended by the President.

With a few exceptions every witness appearing before the Ways and Means Committee during its 6-day open meetings condemned the type of excess-profits tax prepared by the administration as unsound, discriminatory, inflationary, and highly detrimental to the welfare of our Nation.

These witnesses, distinguished and successful businessmen from all parts of the United States, expressed with unanimity their willingness to pay their full share toward the additional all-out defense costs, but they desired to do so in a manner that would not jeopardize the economic structure of the country.

Chief among those favorable to the excess-profits-tax proposal of the President was the CIO.

Mr. Chairman, there is little doubt in my mind that in preparing its tax recommendations to be submitted to the Congress, President Truman ignored the advice of his own fiscal experts—including the Secretary of the Treasury and the Internal Revenue Commissioner—and instead adopted the tax program of the CIO.

I believe that the program the Ways and Means Committee had under consideration is the CIO program. This arrogant labor organization has been propagandizing for years for a permanent excess-profits tax, despite the fact that such a tax would be highly inflationary and harmful to the Nation. The CIO bosses believe that the wastefulness and extravagance engendered by the excess-profits tax would be to their distinct selfish advantage.

The American people had valid reason to expect that after the last election the unholy alliance between the White House and the CIO would be terminated. Unfortunately their expectations have not been realized. Presumably the CIO still calls the tune and the President dances. This situation is cause for genuine alarm in these dangerous times.

Because of tremendous opposition to the President's type of tax program the Republican members of the committee sought to clarify the so-called mandate of the Congress respecting tax legislation.

It was our position that the Ways and Means Committee was not confined exclusively to drafting and reporting an unsound excess-profits-tax proposal. We believe that the congressional directive gave to the Ways and Means Committee discretion in this matter.

The Republican minority sought by a joint resolution to have the House redefine its directive. I offered a joint resolution that would have instructed the Ways and Means Committee to report out a bill raising the necessary revenue by means of a sound excess-profits tax and/or a corporation defense tax which would successfully combat inflation and safeguard our economy.

The joint resolution was ruled out of order by the Speaker. The President's proposal that our committee has had under brief consideration and which is here for House action is unsound tax legislation.

We Republicans deplore the fact that such an unsound piece of tax legislation should be presented here for action when the necessity for sound legislation to build up our defense forces in the face of ruthless Communist aggression is so essential.

We Republicans have long recognized the importance of making our Nation militarily strong. It was the Republican Eightieth Congress which proposed a 70-group air force. But as you know, Mr. Speaker, the President refused to build up such a force. We have consistently and constantly championed military preparedness. Our record in opposition to communism at home and abroad is there for all to see.

The question in this hour of peril is, Will the Democratic majority join the Republican minority in repudiating the inflationary CIO-tax program and enact instead a sound anti-inflationary tax bill that will raise the necessary revenue to support our Armed Forces?

We cannot accomplish the task that confronts the Nation by accepting the tax program recommended and sponsored by the CIO.

Mr. Chairman, this bill—H. R. 9827—it is said, meets the mandates of the Congress, expressed in section 701 of the Revenue Act of 1950. It does no such thing.

It is presumed to impose a corporate excess-profits tax. It does no such thing.

Its justification is based upon the costs of our accelerated defense program. There is not such basis.

It is alleged that it strengthens the fiscal position of the Treasury. It does no such thing.

It is claimed that it will check inflation. It will do not such thing.

It is asserted that it will aid our national-defense program. It will do no such thing.

This bill is fathered and conceived by hysteria. It is a cross between hysteria and haste. It should be named "Hypocrisy."

If it is passed by the House of Representatives, it will be passed in ignorance. Not one Member of this House of Representatives will understand its provisions. Not one of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means understands its provisions. Its policies have never been adopted by the Committee on Ways and Means. Its provisions have never been approved by the Committee on Ways and Means. It has not even been read by the Committee on Ways and Means, sitting as a committee. I doubt if it has been read in toto by any member of the Committee on Ways and Means, sitting alone. I know it is comprehended by no one. The combined brains and abilities of all the official experts put together cannot construe it, let alone justify it. It is a shameful example of the reckless regimentation of our legislative processes. It is a shuddering example of the House of Representatives of the United States of America shackled to a dictatorship. It is dictatorship delegated to experts.

This bill is the consequence of a cry of haste, haste—when there is need for care. It is a terrible illustration of how the fundamental policies of the present administration are formulated and adopted. We see now the results of international policies conceived in haste and executed in confusion. We see now the consequences of past fiscal policies adopted in ignorance and administered blindly and blunderingly. Fiscal policies should be above and beyond partisan politics.

Every policy of this administration should be reexamined. I am a reexaminist. I am also an examinist. The Republican Party is a reexaminist party. And it is an examinist party. The leaders of the Democratic Party fear, and therefore oppose, reexamination. But only a moron fails or refuses to reexamine—unless perchance we also include the headstrong boy who is too stubborn to reexamine. And now the leaders of the Democratic Party are determined to prevent examination. Why? What is it they fear? What this country needs today is a reexamination of every existing policy of the present administration and an examination of every proposed policy of the present administration: Common sense and mature consideration. Judgment applied to known facts. Careful examination and analysis. The more exacting the examination the more simple the reexamination. Sound policies—with no apologies. Policies of which we can be proud—with no apologies. Enforceable policies—with no apologies. Policies upon which our future will be fashioned—with no apologies. And I remark in passing that there are no apologies adequate for the mess we are in today. The Republican Party can repeat and repeat "We told you so." But that does not remedy the mess.

"Make haste to waste" is the program of the present Democratic Party. "Nothing succeeds like excess" seems to be the motto. A Democratic Party which has abandoned all democratic principles and processes should abandon its name or be deprived of it.

MANDATE OF THE CONGRESS

Section 701 of the Revenue Act of 1950 was adopted by the Congress after much debate. It was based upon the so-called George-Millikin substitute for the amendment proposed to the bill by Senator O'MAHONEY, which, he claimed, would impose an excess-profits tax upon corporate earnings. The O'Mahoney amendment was admittedly designed by its sponsor and advocates to limit profits, not to tax them. It was based upon the policy that its sponsors and advocates could and would determine what they thought to be reasonable profits and that they would limit profits to the amount so determined. Under no circumstances would they permit profits to increase. It was not directed toward profits on war or defense contracts. It was not designed to touch the profiteer. Growth, progress, brains, ability, increased capacity, increased volume, increased efficiency, increased sales, increased investment, increased inflation would be disregarded—perhaps I suppose because they would be prohibited.

But the O'Mahoney amendment was defeated and the so-called George-Millikin substitute was adopted by the Senate. It was adopted by the House of Representatives on September 14, 1950. With a slight change in phraseology, it was then incorporated in the Revenue Act of 1950 which became a law on September 23, 1950.

It will be noted that section 701 (b) directs the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation to make a full and complete study of the problems involved in the taxation of excess profits accruing to corporations as the result of the national-defense program in which the United States is now engaged; and to report the results of the study to the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Finance. These are the profits that were to be taxed under the mandate to the Committee on Ways and Means. The Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation has made no such study and has made no such report. But it is admitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, speaking for the administration, by the experts of the Treasury who have compiled copious statistics, by the staff of the joint committee, and, I am confident, even by the chairman and the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, that there are now no "excess profits accruing to corporations as a result of the national-defense program." On the contrary, our national-defense spending during 1950 is less than our national-defense spending during 1949. We have had no facts submitted to us and we have had no estimates made with respect to excess profits accruing to corporations as a result of the national-defense program during 1951. However, it would seem from the present scheduled procurement program of the Defense Department for the calendar year 1951—which we insist be stepped up before it is too late—that there could be no excess profits accruing to corporations as a result of the national-defense program during 1951. At the present time, we Republicans do not know. The administration does not know. The Congress does not know. Is the Democratic Party afraid of the facts? Has the Democratic Party not yet formulated its apologies for the lack of a program? Is this why the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means delegated to the Treasury the duty of writing this bill—an opportunity the Treasury has been seeking for many, many years.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means has deliberately failed to meet the mandate of the Congress. It has deliberately disregarded the mandate of the Congress. The administration has whipped it into a frenzy and into complete submission. The Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means do not submit so meekly. We openly challenge the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and each Democratic member of the committee to explain each of the basic policies incorporated in this bill and to state when that policy was adopted by the Committee on Ways and Means. We do not ask him to explain each provision of the bill; that we know he can not do. But we tell you that there is policy after policy after policy after policy incorporated in this bill and never even submitted to the committee for consideration, let alone being adopted by the committee.

If the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means desire to delegate to the Treasury the power to tax, let this issue be raised squarely and openly. Let it be faced frankly. Let the voters decide. A revolution was fought over a similar issue. Our forefathers were not afraid. Let the Democratic Party hang its head in shame as it abandons the principles for which our forefathers fought. But let it confess to you and to the public that it is incompetent to exercise the greatest power ever bestowed by mankind upon its representatives—the power to tax.

I cannot believe that the House of Representatives so interpets its mandate.

COMMITTEE PROCEDURE

Mr. Chairman, I propose that the House of Representatives itself determine upon the propriety of the procedure adopted by the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Except for the representatives of the Treasury Department, not one single witness was given a real opportunity to be heard before the committee. Witnesses experienced in the problems of taxation and experienced in the principles of Government finance appealed to be heard: "Fifteen minutes and your time is up."

Witnesses knowing the effect of increased taxation upon their affairs appealed to be heard: "Fifteen minutes and your time is up."

Witnesses who appreciated the effect of the last excess-profits tax appealed to be heard: "Fifteen minutes and your time is up."

Witnesses fearing and dreading the effect of the so-called excess-profits tax principles advocated by the Secretary of the Treasury appealed to be heard: "Fifteen minutes and your time is up."

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, we challenge you to explain in 15 minutes any one of the 146 pages of this bill. We advise you not to accept the challenge.

We challenge you to discuss intelligently in 15 minutes the policies involved on any one of the 146 pages of this bill. We advise you not to accept the challenge.

We challenge you to interpret in 15 minutes any of the sections of the excess-profits tax in force during World War II. We advise you not to accept the challenge.

We challenge you to explain in 15 minutes the administration of any one of the sections of the excess-profits tax in force during World War II. We advise you not to accept the challenge.

We challenge you to explain in 15 minutes the administrative difficulties and problems involved in any one of the sections of the excess-profits tax in force during World War II. We advise you not to accept the challenge.

We challenge you to set forth in 15 minutes—not to discuss, but merely to set forth—the policies involved in financing the $52,000,000,000 of Government debt maturing within the next 12 months. We advise you not to accept the challenge.

We challenge you to set forth in 15 minutes—not to discuss, but merely to set forth—the problems involved in servicing the $257,000,000,000 public debt. We advise you not to accept the challenge.

We challenge you to let your imaginations wander over the problems involved in financing the national defense program upon which we are now engaged and to give us the results in 15 minutes. We advise you not to accept the challenge.

Scores of witnesses, able witnesses, experienced witnesses, witnesses with facts, witnesses with judgment, witnesses with common sense, witnesses competent to assist the Committee on Ways and Means—all were denied a reasonable opportunity to be heard. And the committee was denied the opportunity to hear them. They were limited not only in time but in subject matter.

Is this the procedure contemplated by the Congress in its mandate to the committee? Is this procedure approved by the Democratic Party? Is this the procedure we are fighting to preserve? Is this the procedure of a democracy? Let the Democratic leaders answer. The leaders of the Republican Party will tell you that this is not the procedure of a republican form of government.

Let me discuss further the procedure adopted and imposed by the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Following the close of the hearings, the committee went into executive sessions. For a day or two we made progress. A few problems and policies were discussed and debated. They were adopted or rejected by majority vote. They were adopted or rejected upon their merits as each individual Member of the Committee determined for himself. And then something happened.

Apparently the policies and principles so agreed upon were not to the liking of the administration. Apparently they were not to the liking of the CIO. Apparently they were not to the liking of the Democratic Party. Apparently they were not to the liking of a majority of the Democratic Members of the Committee on Ways and Means—even though the adoption of these principles and policies was possible only by the combined vote of a few of the members of the Democratic Party and the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Out came the whip. The lashes were applied. Secret sessions were held. By a vote of a majority of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, certain of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means were deprived of the privilege of voting according to their own judgment and the dictates of their own consciences. Caucus rules were called upon. Each of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means was bound by the majority vote of his own party. He forsook his constituents. He abandoned his duties, his privileges, his responsibilities. To the extent that the policies and principles appearing in this bill were considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, they were approved and adopted by a minority of the committee. The Democratic leaders on the Committee on Ways and Means did not dare permit a majority vote.

And thus this bill was born—never seen by the Committee on Ways and Means, never read by the Committee on Ways and Means, never adopted by the Committee on Ways and Means, and its provisions unknown to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Is this the procedure contemplated by the Congress in its mandate to the committee? Is this procedure approved by the Democratic Party? Is this the procedure we are fighting to preserve? Is this the procedure of a democracy?

PROCEDURE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

This bill was introduced, it is said, on Friday of last week. Let us not deceive ourselves. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means threw a dummy into the hopper. But there was no bill. The staff of the joint committee and the staff of the Legislative Counsel's office, having worked feverishly and all day and all night for several weeks, worked feverishly for one more day and night. Finally the draft prepared by them, with policies and principles dictated in large part by the staff of the Treasury, was sent to the Government Printing Office. The bill was printed and became available Saturday morning. One hundred and forty-six pages of it.

The bill was reported on Friday—unseen, unread, unknown. The Democratic leaders of the House of Representatives ask you to discuss and to debate this bill, to understand it, to adopt its policies and principles, to approve its provisions, and to pass it in 2 days.

Let us not deceive ourselves. And let us not deceive the public. If there is one man among you who has read this bill, let him stand and be counted.

I tell you frankly that I have not studied it as it should be studied. The best that I have been able to do is to attempt to consider a few of its policies and principles. Most of those I have seen for the first time. They were not presented to the Committee on Ways and Means. They were not adopted by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The majority report of the Committee on Ways and Means became available for the first time this morning. If there is a man among you who has read the report—I do not ask that he claim to understand it—let him stand and be counted. I have had no chance to study it. The most that I have been able to do is to examine portions of it. I have attempted to read its discussions with respect to a few of the more important disclosed policies and principles embodied in this bill. No one could even begin to pick up the undisclosed policies and principles embodied in this bill.

Let the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means acknowledge responsibility. Let the Democratic leaders of the House of Representatives acknowledge responsibility. Let them acclaim, approve, and adopt this bill and all its policies and principles and all its provisions. Let them assume and acknowledge responsibility. But do not let them deceive you. Do not let them deceive the public. Do not deceive yourselves, and do not attempt to deceive the public. Not one of you knows or will know what he is doing.

Is this the procedure contemplated by the Congress in its mandate to the committee? Is this procedure approved by the Democratic Party? Is this the procedure we are fighting to preserve? Is this the procedure of a democracy?

INFLATION

The No. 1 enemy of the people of the United States today is inflation. The No. 1 criminal at large in the United States today is that group which has brought inflation upon us, knowingly or ignorantly, intentionally or innocently. That group consists solely of the leaders of the Democratic Party.

That group has given us a 50-cent dollar. That has robbed every citizen of the United States of one-half of his savings, one-half of his home, one-half of his insurance.

That group has doubled the cost of living in the United States. In many fields, costs have more than doubled.

That group has made it impossible for the citizens of the United States to save for the future.

That group is not yet satisfied. It does not intend to stop at a 50-cent dollar. And it dares not tell us how much further it intends to degrade and cheapen it.

The 50-cent dollar was given you by the leaders of the Democratic Party. It was given you over the opposition of the leaders of the Republican Party. The leaders of the Republican Party tell you today that regretfully and unfortunately they cannot restore the value of the dollar to you. Once degraded, it cannot be restored. The apologies of the Democratic Party will not do so. The excuses and the explanations of the Democratic Party will not do so.

But the leaders of the Democratic Party tell you that more inflation lies ahead—more destructive, more dangerous, more damaging, than the inflation of the past. The leaders of the Republican Party are crying "Wolf, wolf"—because there are wolves at your door, presently disguised, perhaps, but no less dangerous. We tell you, first, that the reckless fiscal policies of the present administration must be abandoned. We tell you, second, that the causes of inflation must be ascertained. We tell you, third, that inflation must be stopped.

Inflation is a careless, ruthless thing. It listens not to nice-sounding phrases. In the early days of its life, its breath is sweet and alluring. Yes, even intoxicating. It conceals itself from sight. It refuses to talk. It publishes no vital statistics. Its birth, its growth, its strength, are unrevealed and unreported. It hides itself in the political philosophies of the times. But its roots are entwined in fiscal policies. Its tentacles are firmly enmeshed in the present and past policies of the Democratic administration.

The leaders of the Republican Party say: "Let's try to kill this beast. If we cannot kill it, then let's stunt and stop its growth."

But the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means bury their heads in the sand. They have made no effort to get the facts upon which inflation is thriving. They have made no effort to examine or to reexamine fiscal policies of the present administration—although they are charged with responsibility for them. They have made no effort to ascertain those policies; to have them stated, discussed, reviewed, and debated. They have even refused to attempt to find out what is behind the fight between their own Federal Reserve Board and their own Treasury Department.

The Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means refuse to be blindfolded. We refuse to accept this leadership or lack of leadership. We want the facts upon which inflation is founded. We insist that inflation be stopped.

What has all this to do with the bill pending before you? Not one single witness before the Committee on Ways and Means was permitted to discuss fiscal policies and principles inherent in the defense program. Not a single witness before the Committee on Ways and Means denied that an excess-profits tax was inflationary. Every witness before your committee to the extent that he had an opportunity stated that an excess-profits tax was inflationary.

"Haste to make waste" is the program and the policy of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Republican leaders of the Committee on Ways and Means caution you: Inflation leads to a dictatorship; a dictatorship leads to communism; communism leads to aggression.

The Republican leaders of the Committee on Ways and Means caution you: Inflation is a sign of weakness; weakness is the necessary consequence of its blood-sucking and strength-sapping tactics. A national-defense program founded upon weakness should never be begun.

The leaders of the Republican Party caution you: Are you not now following the precise policies which the Communists would like to have you follow?

CONSEQUENCES OF DEMOCRATIC POLICIES

The horrible mess we are in today is pictured in part by the following factors:

Our public debt today is $257,000,000,000—and the Secretary of the Treasury acknowledges that he is concerned.

We have had 16 consecutive years of deficits since the Democratic Party came into power—except for the 2 years of surpluses—totaling more than $9,000,000,000—when the Republican Party was in control of the Eightieth Congress.

According to the Secretary of the Treasury we will have a deficit of about $2,000,000,000 this current fiscal year—and we have not begun to finance the national-defense program.

Individuals are carrying an income-tax load which is practically at the peak they were carrying during the war, and we have not begun to finance the national-defense program.

Corporations are carrying normal tax burdens never before dreamed of and we have not begun to finance the national-defense program.

Excise taxes imposed as temporary taxes are still on the books today and we have not begun to finance the national-defense program.

There is virtually no such thing today as venture capital. Most of its sources have dried up and disappeared. What capital remains does not dare venture and our officials seem to be surprised at the increase in bank credit.

The tremendous industrial expansion since World War II has been financed largely through borrowing and our officials are concerned over expanding bank credit.

Our deficits have been financed largely through commercial banks and our officials are concerned over the increase in bank credit.

We have not begun the industrial expansion necessary for the national-defense program and everyone should be concerned about how it is to be financed.

We have spent over $100,000,000,000 on our military since the end of the hostilities of World War II and we are told that the Korean conflict has exhausted all our military supplies and equipment.

We are attempting to support a large portion of the so-called non-Communist world and we cannot support ourselves.

There is a woeful lack of perspective.

PROBLEMS FOR TODAY AND TOMORROW

Let me ask the chairman of the committee on Ways and Means and the leaders of the Democratic Party of the House of Representatives and the leaders of the Democratic administration the following:

First. When does our accelerated national-defense program begin accelerating?

Second. What will be spent this fiscal year?

Third. What might be spent next fiscal year?

Fourth. What is the aggregate cost of placing our military in a position to defend the United States against aggression?

Fifth. What will it cost if we are embarked upon the policy of attempting to protect the entire world from aggression?

Sixth. How would each of these costs be financed?

Seventh. How much can be saved annually in a bona fide effort to tighten the belt on nonmilitary expenditures?

Eighth. How much must the productive capacities of industry be expanded to meet the demands of the national defense program?

Ninth. When will this expansion begin and how long will it take?

Tenth. How will the costs of this expansion be met?

These are only a few of the more important questions which the leaders of our Government should ask and answer. So far as I know, the leaders of the Democratic Party have not even asked them as yet. I doubt if they have seen the problems. I know they have not answered them.

And yet we are asked to devise and adopt a tax program to meet the increased costs of defense, to enable the Government to maintain a strong financial position and to tax the high profits resulting from the defense program. I am quoting from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Ways and Means on November 15, 1950.

THE PURPOSES OF AN EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

The Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means accept the mandate of the Congress. The purpose of an excess-profits tax is to tax excess profits accruing to the corporations as a result of the national defense program. The Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means accept Secretary Snyder's definition of "excess profits" as being "high profits resulting from the defense program."

THE PURPOSES OF THE PENDING BILL

The bill now pending before you has no such purposes. It is expressly designed to impose confiscatory rates upon all profits. It makes no effort to segregate normal profits from excess profits. It makes no effort to limit its confiscation to excess profits.

The Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means—and I think that several Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means would join us—believe that this bill will prevent progress; discourage efficiency; prohibit necessary expansion; and adversely affect, most seriously, the national defense program. We say to the Democratic leaders that they must acknowledge the purposes of the bill and assume full responsibility for them.

THE BASE PERIOD

The bill specifies that the base period shall be 1946, 1947, 1948, and 1949.

Everyone knows that these years were in many respects unusual and eccentric. They include periods of reconversion, periods of prolonged strikes. No industry is comparable with any other industry during this period. And members of each industry felt highly fluctuating results. Some earned high profits; some medium profits; some no profits; and some had losses during one or more of these years. In fact, some had losses during every one of these 4 years. Many had declining profits throughout the 4 years. Many were embarked upon tremendous experimental programs and development programs costing huge sums of money and producing no income during these 4 years. And above all, industry was spending $100,000,000,000 in expansion with little or none of the income from the expansion realized during these 4 years.

Having specified the base period years, the bill then says the taxpayer may select three out of four of them. Of course, this rule helps, but what about corporations with declining earnings; with losses during 2 or 3 or all 4 of the years of the base period; with extraordinary research and development costs; with no income from expanded capacities?

The Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means have been denied the time required to develop a satisfactory solution. We have had no opportunity to ascertain the facts. Analysis is necessary. Examination and reexamination are required. Policies and principles must be formulated only after a full and complete study of the problems as directed by section 701 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1950.

The House of Representatives should not be called upon to consider a makeshift program, a disguised program, a misnamed program, a misleading program.

THE 85-PERCENT RULE

Having resorted to the arbitrary base period rule just explained, then say the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means: "The simplest, fairest, and most certain method of determining normal profits is to subtract 15 percent."

The Secretary of the Treasury recommended that the average be discounted 25 percent. He stated frankly that the justification for the suggested 75-percent rule was precisely the same as the justification for the 95-percent rule of World War II's excess-profits tax. But I am confident that the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means know better than to place the justification for their 85-percent rule upon this ground.

The best analysis of the effect of the 85-percent rule which I have seen is an editorial in the New York Times of November 22, 1950. I set it forth in full:

LABOR AND THE EPT

It is difficult to believe that spokesmen for the A. F. of L. and the CIO can really be as naive in economic matters as their testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on the administration's proposal for a corporate excess-profits tax would seem to suggest.

It is only a few weeks ago that Congress enacted the Defense Revenue Act of 1950. That measure increased the corporation income tax to 45 percent, which compares with peak level of 40 percent reached during the Second World War. The administration is now proposing to superimpose upon this what purports to be a wartime excess-profits tax. We use the phrase "purports to be" advisedly, because a true war-profits tax stops with the laying of a heavy impost upon the temporary windfall profits deriving from war, or all-out preparation for war. The plan offered by Secretary Snyder goes far beyond this. It would assume, arbitrarily, that all profits over and above 75 percent of the 1946–49 average were war profits, or rearmament profits, and would tax such excess at the steep wartime rate of 75 percent.

Officials of the A. F. of L. and CIO told the Ways and Means Committee that they were all for such legislation. It was eminently fair, they said, and would be a great help in fighting inflation. Their only criticism of the program, in fact, was that it did not go far enough. Spokesmen for the CIO recommended that instead of 75 percent the excess profits tax rate should be 85 percent.

Well, it makes a difference, of course, whose ox is gored. But, if it is fair to treat the owners of business in this way, tax-wise, then why not the wage earner? Let us see how the principle would look in operation if it were applied to wages. The average weekly earnings of factory workers at the time of the Korean invasian was $58.85. Let us assume that, instead of freezing wages, we were to say that all excess wages resulting from the defense effort should be taxed at a special emergency rate of 75 percent. Now, let us proceed one step further, and introduce the device which makes the administration EPT something quite different from what it purports to be. Instead of applying the new tax on wage income to everything above the level of July 1, 1950, this would make it effective against all wages above 75 percent of figure. Seventy-five percent of $58.85 would be $44.13. If we thumb back through the records we shall find that the month when weekly wages last approximated this figure was August 1946. In other words, if the principle of the administration's EPT were generalized to cover all income it would mean that the wage earner, in addition to personal income taxes would have to pay the Government 75 percent of everything he earned over and above the figure reached in August 1946.

No one has seriously suggested a general excess-income tax, and there is no intention to suggest it here. In a war economy the EPT in the case of corporations is regarded as the counterpart of the wage freeze in the case of labor. Neither has any place in the defense effort until and unless the time comes for the application of full wartime controls. Yet, the very representatives of labor who would, and do, throw up their hands in horror at the suggestion of freezing wages apparently haven't the slighest compunction about urging that business be subjected, not only to a freezing of income at present levels but to a drastic and thoroughly arbitrary roll-back to the level, roughly speaking, of 1946.

You will note that the 75 percent rule would take us back to August of 1946, as applied to the incomes of wage earners. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics' Weekly Earning Series for Production Workers in Manufacturing Industries, the 85 percent rule adopted and advocated by the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means takes up back to August of 1947.

THE PROBLEMS OF DETERMINING EXCESS PROFITS

The problems of determining, defining and segregating excess profits for corporations never have been fully explored. Perhaps some of them can be appreciated if we view them from the point of view of individuals. As applied to corporations, of course, the problems become more confusing and more complex. Therefore more difficult to discern and more impossible of solution. But let us attempt to become a little more familiar with a few of them by considering corresponding problems which would confront individuals. Let us assume two individuals—A and B—engaged in precisely the same endeavors, producing precisely the same products and competing with each other during 1952:

A was not old enough to have earnings during the base period. B had high earnings.

A was unfortunately sick during 3 years of the base period. B's health was normal and good.

A worked on an average of 6 hours a day during the base period. B worked on an average of 12 hours a day. In 1952, on the other hand, A is working 12 hours a day and B is working 6 hours.

A devotes himself during the base period primarily to experimental work. B's experimental work had been concluded.

A had little capacity to finance his enterprise during the base period. B was adequately and amply financed.

A expanded tremendously during the base period and his earnings from the expansion will be reflected for the first time in 1952. B had full capacity during the base period and has not expanded.

A could not reach the markets he wanted to reach during the base period but will finally reach them in 1952. B has a well-established distribution and sales system and will reach only the same markets in 1952.

A devotes considerable time, energy, ingenuity and money to developing a new product or a new process during the base period which will begin to produce income in 1952. B is satisfied with the product he is producing and enters no new field.

A's business is on the up-grade throughout the base period and this will continue into 1952. B's business is on the down-grade throughout the base period and this continues into 1952.

A keeps his plant and facilities "up to the minute." B is satisfied to ride along with what he has.

A acquires a new plant during the end of the base period which will begin to produce substantial income in 1952. B acquires no new assets and operates only the one he had during the base period.

A is mounting the ladder of success. B is disposing of assets and preparing to retire.

I could go on indefinitely, merely contrasting the position of two individuals in the world of business. The framers of the pending tax bill have closed their eyes to every practical situation. They have closed their eyes to actualities. Knowingly or not, they have decided that all A's profits will be considered excess profits, and that none of B's profits will be considered as excess profits.

CONSEQUENCES OF HYSTERIA

Applying the principles of the pending bill to a few available statistics reveals these consequences:

First. The aggregate annual corporate profits during the best 3 years of the 4-year period—for 1947, 1948, 1949—average thirty and seven-tenths billions.

Second. Fifteen percent of this, or four and six-tenths billions, says the bill, are to be taxed at 75 percent.

Third. Corporate profits in the calendar year 1950, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, will be about $6,000,000,000 above the 3-year average. All this $6,000,000,000, says the bill, are to be taxed at 75 percent.

Fourth. If corporate profits decline in 1951, but still do not reach the average of the base period, all the excess will be taxed at 75 percent. If they increase in 1951, all the increase will be taxed at 75 percent.

These must be the consequences of hysteria. They can be explained in no other way.

INVESTED CAPITAL

The excess-profits tax in force during World War I defined invested capital. After years and years and years, the invested capital of the corporation subject to the act was determined.

The excess-profits tax in force during World War II had an entirely different definition of excess profits. All the experience under the World War I act was abandoned. All the work under the World War I act was discarded. Millions and millions of dollars have been and are being spent by the Government and by taxpayers in making new computations of a new invested capital for the purposes of the World War II act.

As a safeguard to the inadequacies of the average earnings basis, your committee was assured that the invested capital basis would be available. No definition of invested capital, other than the one used in the World War II act, was discussed in your committee. Your committee assumed, if it were not assured, that the definition of the World War II act would be used. Simplicity demanded it. Time prevented consideration of any change.

But what do we find?

In the bill pending before you there is an entirely new concept of invested capital. The definition of the World War II act has disappeared. Sections 436 and 437 prescribe new definitions and new concepts. What they mean and what they require, I do not know. I doubt if anyone else knows.

Where this concept came from, I do not know. What its effect will be, I do not know.

Does the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means claim that this concept was presented to the committee, was discussed by the committee, was understood by the committee, and was adopted by the committee? If so, let him tell me when. If so, let him tell me what he understands it to mean. If so, let him explain why the departure from all past experience, from all past computations, and from all computations presently in process.

Let the chairman of the committee state whether this new concept is dictated by common sense or by hysteria.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Chairman, let us prove to the public that the House of Representatives is not dominated and controlled by the CIO. Let us prove to the public that the House of Representatives is a legislative body, an independent legislative body, exercising legislative functions. Let us prove to the public that the House of Representatives expects and insists that its Committee on Ways and Means use its own judgment. Let us prove to the public that the House of Representatives expects its Committee on Ways and Means to formulate tax policies, not to delegate to the Treasury the power to tax.

Mr. Chairman, let us recommit this bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. RICH. You made the statement that the members of the Ways and Means Committee, before this bill was adopted, had not even read the bill.

Mr. REED of New York. That is true. I made a motion before the committee, and it was voted down 15 to 10, that the bill be read, so that we would know what was in it. The first we saw of this bill in its complete form was Monday morning. That is, I saw it Sunday morning. The other members saw it Monday morning, but I came down here Sunday morning at 8 o'clock to see the committee bill and the report.

Mr. RICH. But we got the bill this morning?

Mr. REED of New York. Exactly.

Mr. RICH. You do not mean yesterday morning—Sunday?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; I mean yesterday morning, Sunday. I came down at 8 o'clock to get a copy of the bill and the report.

Mr. RICH. Before the bill came to the committee. It seems to me that when you read those challenges off to the Democratic Party that somebody would have got up and met the challenge. If you challenged the Republican Party, you certainly would have got somebody to respond to you.

Mr. REED of New York. I hold those Members of the House in the highest respect, of course. I have an affection for all of them on that side of the aisle. They are fine men, but they are handicapped. We are not. They are bound by party rules and caucuses, and the administration can dictate to them. They cannot dictate successfully to the Republicans.

Mr. RICH. If the Ways and Means Committee did not report this bill, who do you think did write the bill?

Mr. REED of New York. I think that would be a subject for future investigation.

Mr. RICH. Do you think we ought to have an investigation now to find out who, where, and how they wrote this bill, so that the public in this country could understand that the taxes that are going to be imposed upon them came from some organization other than the Ways and Means Committee of Congress?

Mr. REED of New York. I do not see any prospect of an investigation while the Democratic Party is in power.

Mr. RICH. What are you going to do when the public finds out that it is going to be taxed and taxed and taxed, and nothing has been said, to my knowledge, by the administration about economy in government. Did you have any discussion like that in your Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. REED of New York. No. Economy was not discussed. You know, that is a forbidden subject.

Mr. RICH. Do they ever talk about trying to cut down expenses, instead of trying to tax the people more?

Mr. REED of New York. The Hoover Commission report was not mentioned.

Mr. RICH. We are in bad circumstances.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] mentioned the possibility of an investigation. Possibly we can have that investigation within the next 2 years.

Mr. REED of New York. I hope so. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH].

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, I might say by way of preface that this tax bill has been written in exactly the same manner in which all tax bills which have come before the House since I have been a member of the committee have been written: We have sat around, we have talked, we have listened to witnesses, we have read their statements, technical staffs have worked upon it, the Treasury has given the benefit of their suggestions, the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation has been sitting in, and we have had the benefit of all that information in preparing the bill now presented to the House.

Mr. Chairman, one of the first important measures upon which I was called to vote upon my election to Congress was the Second Revenue Act of 1940, the principal purpose of which was to impose an excess-profits tax on corporations. At the time that bill was considered by the House of Representatives, the Congress had made available for national defense, appropriations and contract authorizations amounting to the then record total of $15,000,000,000. President Roosevelt recommended at that time in simple but eloquent terms the enactment of an excess-profits tax as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

We are engaged in a great national effort to build up our national defenses to meet any and every potential attack.

We are asking even our humblest citizens to contribute their mite. It is our duty to see that the burden is equitably distributed according to ability to pay so that a few do not gain from the sacrifices of the many.

I, therefore, recommend to the Congress the enactment of a steeply graduated excess-profits tax, to be applied to all individuals and all corporate organizations without discrimination.

Mr. Chairman, I was seated on the floor of this House when this message was read, and it impressed me as it impressed my colleagues on both sides of the aisle. There was no room for debate or difference of opinion. The country faced a grave national emergency, and it was the firm conviction of the great Committee on Ways and Means, of which I subsequently was to become a member, that "the rearmanent program should furnish no opportunity for the creation of new war millionaires or the further substantial enrichment of already wealthy persons." In but a few short weeks in 1940, an excess-profits tax bill had been passed by both Houses of the Congress and was approved by the President on October 8, 1940.

I have recalled this legislative history because it has seemed strangely coincidental that my last few weeks as a Member of the House should have to be devoted toward the enactment of an excess-profits-tax bill. Now, instead of $15,000,000,000 for defense appropriations, we have already under consideration the staggering total for the military and atomic-energy programs of more than $42,000,000,000.

As President Truman wrote the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means on November 14, 1950, in recommending an excess-profits tax to yield $4,000,000,000 at current income levels:

Although the total amount of the expenditures which will ultimately be required for military security is necessarily uncertain, it will certainly exceed the yield of existing taxes augmented by such a profits tax.

It is clear that the impact of this spending will greatly affect and change our domestic economy. Not only must we provide to the maximum extent possible for payment of the cost of rearmament from current revenues, but we must also use all possible diligence again to try to prevent "the creation of new war millionaires or the further substantial enrichment of already wealthy persons."

When this Congress is calling men to fight and die in the service of their country, any conceivable financial sacrifice pales by comparison. Nevertheless, although there is no practical alternative, as I view it, to the enactment of the excess-profits tax, upon which the Congress has already agreed in principle, it was the responsibility of the Committee on Ways and Means to take into account the previous experience with the excess-profits tax in World War II, and to insure that mobilization is not impeded through any unwise provisions of the tax laws.

H. R. 9827, the pending bill, would tap corporate profits to the extent of $3,000,000,000 at current profit levels, which are now nearly 50 percent greater than they were in the first quarter of this year. The bill follows the basic outlines of the excess-profits tax in effect during World War II, but adjustments have been made which not only greatly increase the credits available to almost all corporate businesses but which especially provide special incentive to small growing corporations and to new businesses.

TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS MINIMUM CREDIT

A very important provision is the $25,000 minimum credit which insures complete exemption from the excess-profits tax for corporations earnings less than $25,000 a year.

MORE LIBERAL EARNINGS CREDIT

Since the new base period 1946–49 includes a period of high Government spending for military and foreign defense programs, and also reflects profits from the accumulated demand for civilian goods built up during World War II, it provides a generous standard beyond which it is proper to tax corporate profits at a very high rate. Moreover, corporations would be able to choose the three best years out of four, and to raise any deficit year to zero.

INVESTED CAPITAL CREDIT

The pending bill also gives corporations the option of a credit on invested capital just as during World War II but the rates of return allowed on invested capital before application of the excess-profits tax rate are increased by approximately 50 percent.

RATE OF TAX

Another interesting comparison of this bill with that in effect in World War II is that the rate of tax on excess profits would be 75 percent, whereas the rate in effect in 1942 was 85½ percent. No corporation would pay a combined normal tax, surtax, and excess-profits tax of more than 67 percent, as compared with the 72-percent over-all ceiling in effect in World War II. Many adjustments are designed to minimize the impact of the excess-profits tax on corporations with an unusual earnings experience in the base period and to take into account additions to capital both during the latter part of the base period and after the base period.

SUMMARY

All in all, I believe that H. R. 9827 is an important addition to the Federal tax structure and that its prompt enactment will manifest our determination to keep our country fiscally strong as we gird ourselves for whatever may lie ahead.

Mr. Chairman, there has been some criticism in respect to the manner in which these hearings were conducted, because no witness was permitted to have more than 15 minutes for his prepared statement. The question I would propound is this: Was it more important to give those witnesses so much time that we would not be able to pass a tax bill during this session, or was it more important to give them less time and see that we got out a tax bill that would raise the revenues necessary to carry on this Korean conflict?

We are all of the same stripe of Americans and I know that when the time comes those who now oppose this proposition here will still vote for the bill, because they know it is the only one that can pass during this session of the Congress, and we must raise additional revenues. We have heard very consistently during the 10 or 11 years I have been here these complaints against the enactment of legislation that has to do with taxes on corporate profits. In 1941 we heard the same complaint against the price controls where profits were increasing inordinately, and again we heard the same complaint so far as the excess-profits tax of 1940 was concerned. When we endeavored to increase the corporate tax later on, we heard the same complaint. When we sought to limit the profits in war by renegotiation, we heard the same complaint. Now those same complaints are again made by business saying that they would prefer increased corporate taxes and renegotiation as against the excess-profits-tax program here.

I want to say to you Members of the Committee that in my judgment this is the best bill that we could get out under the mandate that Congress gave us, and as a result I am sure that we will here take the first step to take the profits out of war.

At this point, allow me to take this opportunity, since this may and probably will be the last time I shall take the floor to address my colleagues, to express my gratitude for the friendship and the cooperation I have enjoyed in mutual service here, and to assure you of my continued interest as you work to strengthen and preserve the precious heritage of freedom so dear to all of us.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HESELTON. I would like to ask a question about the application of H. R. 9827 on the television-manufacturing industry. The printed hearings before the committee at pages 464 and 468 contain testimony by Mr. Sprague, industry representative, to the effect that this industry had a tremendous growth between 1949 and the middle of 1950, and that the industry would be discriminated against unless special provision was made for growth in pre-Korean war 1950. How does this bill take care of situations similar to that confronting this industry?

Mr. LYNCH. I am very glad my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts has asked that question, because it is a question that has caused considerable anxiety, I might say, on the part of the committee, and we have endeavored to work out arrangements whereby the television industry will not be hurt to the extent that they anticipate.

There are four provisions in this bill which, in my opinion, will be particularly helpful to the television industry.

The first of these is the alternative growth credit. This permits corporations meeting certain conditions evidencing growth to use 1949 earnings or the average of 1948 and 1949 earnings, whichever is higher, as their excess-profits credit in lieu of the ordinary-average-earnings credit in the three best years in the period of 1946 to 1949. The value of the television sets sold in 1946 and 1947, in terms of manufacturers' sales prices, were less than 1 percent of the value of those sold in 1949 and the value of the sets sold in 1948 was only about 40 percent of the value of those sold in 1949. As a result, allowing television companies which have grown to use 1949 earnings will be of very considerable value to the television industry.

The second of these provisions, which will be helpful to the television industry, is one which permits corporations to increase their average earnings credit at a 12-percent rate of return for one-half of the new equity capital and retained earnings put into the business in 1948 and for all of such investments in 1949. A similar allowance is made for additions to borrowed capital in 1948 and 1949. An industry which has grown as much as the television industry of necessity increased its capital during 1948 and 1949. I do not believe there is any dispute as to that.

The third provision which should be useful to the television industry is one which permits the excess-profits credit to be increased by 12 percent of new equity capital and retained earnings put into a business after 1949. Allowance is also made for new borrowed capital at a rate equal to 133 percent of the interest payments on such capital. The television industry has already increased its capital in 1950 and can be expected to increase its capital still further in the future. This means that the television industry will receive larger and larger excess-profits-tax credits as these additional investments are made.

The fourth provision which may be useful to some members of the television industry is the carry forward of losses from the base period to excess-profits-tax years. For those who have had losses, such as television broadcasters, this will prevent the imposition of any excess-profits taxes until these losses have been offset.

Does that explain the situation?

Mr. HESELTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I have been chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means for more than 15 years. I have been a member of that committee for nearly 25 years. I can truthfully say, in all sincerity, that during my long service on the committee no man has served on that committee who has rendered more intelligent, more faithful, more useful, and more outstanding service than the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH]. His leaving that committee, in my opinion, is a great loss not only to our committee but to the Congress and the country.

Mr. LYNCH. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNCH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I am very glad the chairman has spoken of his high regard for our good friend and colleague [Mr. LYNCH]. I am sure the chairman spoke for every member of the committee when he told the House of the high regard in which the gentleman from New York has been held by both the Republicans and the Democrats. They all have a fondness for him. They are going to miss him very, very much. He has always proved himself to be a very clear thinker. He had a grasp of the problems before him. He was always gentlemanly. I say again with all my heart, we will miss him.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would not let this opportunity pass to say how I feel about my distinguished colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH]. In my long service in the House I have, of course, met all those who have been Members in that time. Naturally, every man is a man unto himself. Some scintillate with brilliance, some with oratory, and some with logic, and so forth, and so forth. The good character of some is very pronounced and well recognized. But there is one virtue that everybody does not have, and that is what we call common courtesy.

I want to say to and about my good friend from New York that although he is able and efficient and his character is unassailable, as it were, and he has these other virtues which I like so much in public men, and especially in my good friends in Congress, my friend, WALTER LYNCH, has this virtue of common courtesy. I am sure when he leaves the House of Representatives he will take with him the affection of everyone who knows him intimately. We on the Committee on Ways and Means have had many battles, of course, as the Members have in all the other committees, but nobody anywhere that I know of will have any ill feeling toward this fine gentleman, the Member from New York State, my dear friend, Hon. WALTER LYNCH.

Mr. Chairman, it is well recognized that all tax legislation is very difficult. It is difficult for even those of us who work with it all the time. I make no claim to being a tax expert. It is mighty difficult for any member to understand these complicated set-ups and to explain them adequately. But I hope we can bring ourselves together on common ground for just a moment, if you please, Let us look back at the situation as we left the taxation matter when the Congress last adjourned. You will remember that last spring and summer we on the Committee on Ways and Means spent a great deal of time, I believe we spent 5 months in getting ready a tax reduction bill. That was the bill that was intended to provide reduction of the excise taxes. That tax reduction bill was studied and proposed and approved by both Democrats and Republicans alike. There was not so much difference so far as I could see, so far as the desire to reduce excise taxes was concerned. There were a number of burdensome excise taxes that should have been reduced. The Ways and Means Committee reported that bill and we passed it in the House, and sent it over to the other body just at the time when the Korean trouble happened. It then developed clearly that we had to have more taxes. That was no time to reduce taxes. It developed that we had to have a regular tax bill. Instead of reducing taxes, as this House had proposed to do, the other body passed a new bill, and we in turn passed it on this side. It was the last important action of the summer session of this Congress.

Then what did we do in that new bill? We raised the taxes on corporations from, I think, 38 percent to 45 percent. We made this increased tax on corporations retroactive to July 1, 1950. We increased the income taxes of individuals retroactive to October 1, 1950, with the result that every one of you since last October has had the withholding from your salary check sharply increased.

Today we are confronted with another war situation which is difficult. Every American heart is sad because of the Korean situation. Really this is a poor time to consider this restrictive bill. We have on our hands a real war situation, a kind of panicky situation. We have gone to work and reported what we consider an excess-profits-tax bill. But that is not going to be the principal consideration which will determine the passage of this bill. The considerations now are going to be: How about Korea? How about the President's last message? How are we going to get all of these eighteen billions that the President requests? I ask you again, What are we going to do about getting all the money which the President has asked for? I am afraid that we cannot get it through taxation. If we cannot get it through taxation, then how are we going to get it? Are we going to have to sell bonds, and pledge the credit of the Government to the extreme?

My colleagues, this is a serious situation. We are here considering what we call an excess-profits-tax bill which will at best only produce about three billions. When the other body was considering the last bill that we sent to them, they put out a report in which they said this:

> Your committee deemed it unwise to delay the bill by attempting to consider other methods of raising revenue, such as excess-profits taxes, which would require several weeks of hearings and detailed study and analysis by the committee and its staff.

Last fall when the other body had plenty of time as it were to consider the thing, they said, "This is no time to consider excess-profits taxes."

My colleagues, this is not a time to consider an excess-profits-tax bill. Ask the men in the street about it, however, and the chances are that he will say, "Tax the corporations? Yes, sir—tax them and make them pay on their war-contract excess profits." I agree with his viewpoint, but let me ask, Who has been making any excess profits out of war contracts? Heretofore Congress has not passed excess-profits-tax laws except during wartimes. They have not been making any wartime excess profits yet, but maybe they will. I know there is not a Member of the Congress who would want to willfully and knowingly exculpate or relieve anybody from paying taxes on any excess profits which he has made unfairly or purely and simply by reason of his connection with the Government in having a Government contract.

What would be the best way to handle this situation? You may think it would be presumptuous on my part to try to tell you how. I can tell you my opinion. If I had the disposition of this matter in my hands, I would pass a renegotiation bill; get ready to renegotiate contracts which the Government is going to enter into now with people who are going into the business of making excess profits. Let us do that. There is a bill pending in the House that would do effectively what we are trying to do ineffectively. It would be more appropriate if we had that bill before us now, than to have this bill with reference to excess profits, when the excess profits have not yet been made. Renegotiation legislation would catch all of those that this excess-profits bill will catch and many more.

Perhaps some of you have not considered what a renegotiation law will do. A renegotiation law will require that all contracts with the Government must be made with the understanding that the Government will know all about all costs and all profits connected with the contract and that the proper amount of taxes will be collected. The Government will say that everybody who has a Government contract over a certain amount must submit his purchases to the Government. The Government must know what you do, how you spend your money, and how much you make, and at the end of that transaction the Government will take out the profits. That is the time to take out taxes for excess profits. It is not the time now. But we have got before us an excess-profits bill, and I expect the bill will be passed.

In the committee we had a great deal of trouble to make an excess-profits tax palatable, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has stated in his remarks in great detail. It is very difficult to make an excess-profits tax work. Let me prove it to you. It proves itself.

Congress has passed only two excess-profits-tax laws. One was after the First World War and the other was during the Second World War. You know, there are thousands of claims now pending against the Government, growing out of excess-profits taxes levied after the First World War. There are thousands of those claims, involving millions of dollars. There are thousands of claims following the Second World War, indicating that it is difficult to pass a bill providing for a tax on excessive profits and make it work. The lawsuits that followed those two excess-profits-tax bills have been tremendously numerous and tremendously large in volume of dollars and they prove that those two bills were not effective and did not produce as much revenue as they should have produced.

Now, this bill that we are now considering has not been seen by a large majority of the Members and has been read by only a very few. The report has not even been read. I want to give you a little illustration of how, in an effort to tax excess profits, they will tax a man who has made no excess profits. This law will be unfair and unjust in many cases. Let me give you an illustration. It is difficult to follow these illustrations, but if you will be patient I shall try to illustrate it to you.

This bill applies only to corporations and it provides that the corporations have a right to take as their base for taxation an average of their earnings in 3 of the last 5 years—1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, and 1950. They can take the average of any 3 of those 5 years for what they call their base. Suppose I run a big department store some place in some town, far away from any munitions plant or war plant. I have been running that store for years. I made a hundred thousand dollars in 1946; I made a hundred thousand in 1947, a hundred thousand in 1948, but in 1949 and 1950 I have dropped back and make only $90,000 in 1950. In 1951 I will make only $90,000. I accept my base of the average of the three highest years; that is, $100,000. Then the law says, "We will take 85 percent of that as a basis." That is $85,000. Suppose in 1950 I do not make $100,000, but I make only $90,000. In that case I have made no excess profits. And in 1951 I make only $90,000 none of which is above the average of $100,000 which is my base. Since I have made more than $85,000 in 1950 and in 1951 I must pay an excess-profits tax on the excess over the basis of $85,000 which will be $5,000, and so I have to pay excess-profits tax of 75 percent on $5,000 which will be $3,750 for each of the 2 years. I will be paying an excess-profits tax while I did not make any excess profits in those 2 years. Not only that, I did not make as much as I did before. Of course I will pay the regular tax on the $90,000, but I was not earning any excess profits and consequently I should not be made to pay an excess-profits tax.

So I say that this bill is just full of inconsistencies and irregularities that are going to make it difficult to enforce.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] mentioned the fact that nobody supported the bill before the committee except labor organizations.

Only three groups of labor people came before the committee in favor of the legislation, but against the legislation there were about 200, and I say now, Mr. Chairman, without a peradventure of doubt at all that these 200 people came from all over the country representing big industry and many small industries, but all of them representing business, and everyone was against this legislation at this time; and to their credit every one of them said, "We are willing to pay more taxes; we have got to carry the burden, and we are willing to carry the burden." But they did not want this hasty legislation.

That is the situation that confronted us then and confronts us now. There is no question but that, if this bill passes, a lot of people will be greatly disappointed and some of them will be compelled to pay taxes they ought not to pay because they do not meet the test, and many others will make profits that are not related to the war at all, yet they too will be put through this mill. No doubt the bill will pass on this side and it will pass on the other side, but I predict that just about the first thing the new Congress will be confronted with will be the necessity for this Ways and Means Committee to bring in a bill raising much of the $18,000,000,000 with which the President wants to carry on the war. How are we going to do it? We have got to be careful how we tax.

I should like to quote from the statements of many of these very capable businessmen and lawyers who appeared before our committee but time will not permit. While the statement of each of these men was different from all others, because each spoke of his own business, yet there was a sameness that ran through all of their statements.

I shall give you a part of the statement made by Mr. Clarence D. Laylin, who is a very able tax lawyer and who represents the Ohio Chamber of Commerce, which I think is the largest State chamber of commerce in the country, and he also represents the Council of State Chambers of Commerce, to which council I think most of the State chambers of commerce belong. Mr. Laylin said before the committee:

Business is ready to bear its fair share of necessary defense costs but we are opposed to the type of taxation which has heretofore been miscalled an excess-profits tax.

The country has had ample experience with a so-called excess-profits tax; and that experience teaches us that, whatever may be claimed for the tax in theory, it is both administratively and economically unsound, even as a war measure.

Its supposed virtues as a revenue measure are qualified by excessive costs of assessment and compliance; it discourages incentive for prudent management; it encourages wastefulness and inefficiency in management; it is distinctly inflationary; and it penalizes the small and growing and the progressive companies as against those which are laggard or static. In peacetime such a tax is no more than a crude attempt to limit corporate profits. Under any conditions it would not contribute to the expansion of production, but on the contrary would retard the growth of our economy.

The theory of an excess-profits tax is that it recaptures for the revenues some part of those profits of a corporation which exceed its normal profits. Therefore it is necessary to devise some measure, or measures, to determine, for all the various types and conditions of corporations, what may fairly be considered the normal profits of each separate company. To accomplish this, extremely complicated bases, growth formulas, and relief devices have been and will necessarily be written into each excess-profits-tax statute. The attempt has never been successful, nor is there any likelihood that it ever will be. It is not necessary to assert that all of the thousands of unsettled and litigated cases under the law in effect at the termination of World War II will ultimately be found meritorious, in order to make the point that any tax law which engenders so much controversy is not a sound measure.

With reference to the advisability of at this time enacting legislation providing for fair renegotiation of contracts, Mr. Laylin says:

The asserted justification for drastic taxation of excess profits is that defense preparations result in abnormal corporate profits. In our opinion, there is no reason why Government contractors as such should realize abnormal profits. Efficient procurement policies of the Government agencies with reasonable forward pricing provisions in cases of nonstandard products, and efficient overall renegotiation, with the amounts recaptured going to the Treasury, should effectively prevent direct war profiteering, and to that extent eliminate the supposed occasion for the imposition of an excess-profits tax.

No doubt it is true that the inflationary effect of large defense expenditures is not confined to government contractors, but to some extent pervades the entire economy, and enhances the profits of many other kinds of business. But if that be so, why attempt the elaborate discriminations of an excess-profits tax?

With reference to retroactivity let me say this is a legislative procedure that is seldom justified and is never without objection. With reference to this part of the proposed legislation that we are now considering, Mr. Laylin says:

In spite of the mandate of the Revenue Act of 1950 and the recommendations of the President, the State chambers respectfully but firmly oppose making any excess-profits tax or other increased tax on corporations retroactive to any part of the year 1950. Retroactive taxation at or near the end of a calendar year would be confusing and in many cases oppressive, and could be justified only, if at all, by imperative necessity. No showing of any such necessity has been made, as we see it. The formal statement of the Secretary of the Treasury certainly makes none.

One of the largest law firms in America dealing almost exclusively with tax problems is the firm of Alvord & Alvord, who have their central office in Washington but who have other offices in other parts of the world. Mr. Ellsworth C. Alvord appears frequently before the Ways and Means Committee when tax bills are being considered. He appeared before the committee at the public hearings held with reference to the legislation that we are now considering. He went into the matter exhaustively, because his firm represents many of the big taxpayers of the Nation. In a summation of the failures of excess-profits-tax legislation that has heretofore been passed by Congress he stated:

THE TROUBLES WITH AN EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

Everyone with experience knows that a so-called excess-profits tax must not be designed to produce substantial revenues, and that no excess-profits tax has yet been devised which—(1) is a reliable revenue producer; (2) can be administered; (3) applies fairly and without discrimination; (4) encourages growth, expansion, new industries, new products; (5) promotes competition and lower prices; (6) contributes to economies and encourages decreasing costs; (7) rewards ability, ambition, risk-taking, and progress; (8) gives industry the elbow room it needs; (9) creates financial independence and stimulates sound financing; (10) grants to youth the opportunity to build a business; (11) builds strength.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the gentleman has made a rather fair statement. But on what grounds can we win a tax fight if we proceed on the basis of wishful thinking and do a thing which cuts down production and discourages risk capital and scares off credit? And the other destructive thing which the gentleman from Ohio knows very well this bill will do: Our people are telephoning and writing us about these matters, and we have to say to them that as individual Members of this House we are hog-tied, that the rules of this House do not permit amendments to be offered to tax bills on the floor of the House by individual Members, and that we must either vote it up or down. That is the cold-blooded procedure we are up against, and I do not like to vote for any kind of law which my experience, my conscience, and my best judgment tells me is bad.

Mr. JENKINS. I see the gentleman's point. I can only say this by way of commiseration: We might say that this bill we have before us now is a thousand percent better than when it was when first talked about.

I want to give credit to the Republicans—and I am speaking to the group right in front of me now—for the addition of a number of provisions put into this bill, although we did not get to write them in, but at our suggestion, and because of what we did, they were put into the bill—things that have made the bill a little more acceptable and a little less unjust. But there is an over-all opposition to it, and that is against trying to impose an excess-profits tax when there is no war and when they themselves have conceded that they expect to get only about $2,000,000,000 out of excess profits. The Democrats started out expecting to get between four and six billions of dollars, but it is now coming down to only about two billion.

So, as I said before, the first thing the new Congress will have to face the first of the year will be to write a big general tax bill to do the things the gentleman has in mind. Again I say that the situation has changed since the Ways and Means Committee commenced consideration of this bill. The urge for additional revenues is so great and so demanding that it will be difficult to vote against this bill even with its faults.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I gladly yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman just made the statement that the Republicans put certain provisions in this bill. Will the gentleman tell us any one provision they put in the bill?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; I will mention two or three. We took care of the growth provision, which encourages growing concerns; we took care of new businesses, such as television; and we took care of those companies, of all those companies, whose rates are controlled and fixed by public commissions, such as the public utilities, telephone companies, and transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce as common carriers. I have mentioned three. I could name five or six more, but my time is up.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I remind the gentleman that the committee——

Mr. JENKINS. I did not yield for an argument; I yielded for a question, and I have answered the gentleman's question, I think.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER].

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, previous speakers, particularly on the Republican side, have already admitted that the bill as reported by the Committee on Ways and Means will undoubtedly pass, and they will probably vote for it too on final passage. So we are having a lot of debate, which is good in itself, to inform the House and the country what provisions are in the bill.

Complaint has been made that the Committee on Ways and Means should have devoted more time to the consideration of the bill and also that the committee did not understand correctly the wishes of the Members of the House and the Members of the other body with respect to an excess-profits-tax bill. Mr. Chairman, I say that every Member of this House and I think everybody in the country knows that the House and the other body intended that the Committee on Ways and Means report out an excess-profits-tax bill. There never was any doubt about that in anyone's mind, in my opinion. So the committee has now performed its function: It has reported an excess-profits-tax bill.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to go into a little history. Everybody who has followed the debate in the other body knows that when an amendment was presented to the corporate tax bill passed last year which would impose an excess-profits tax, the amendment failed by only a few votes. It failed only because a substitute proposition was offered and the promise was made at that time that this Congress would enact an excess-profits-tax bill applicable to this year's profits. The same thing is true in this body. There was no doubt about that last September when this body on roll call voted overwhelmingly, almost 2 to 1, when it voted down the previous question, in itself a very unusual procedure, so that it would have an opportunity to vote on an excess-profits-tax bill. Everyone wanted to vote for an excess-profits-tax bill last September, but we were prevented from doing so simply because of a parliamentary situation.

Now we have an opportunity to correct that failure to vote last September. Personally, I think it would have been better for the country if an excess-profits-tax bill had been passed last September. In my opinion, it would have helped stem to some extent at least the inflationary spiral to which this country has been subjected.

This excess-profits matter is not anything new. Let me remind you, Mr. Chairman, that in 1916 we passed what might be termed an excess-profits bill when we put a special tax on munitions. Then in 1917 we changed that and passed a general excess-profits-tax bill. We did the same thing in World War II. In other words, we did it in World War I and we did it in World War II. Now we are in this defensive situation, and we are going to enact it again. So there is nothing precedent-shattering about this proposition at all. Of course, those who oppose an excess-profits-tax bill do not like to say that they are opposed to it. Some of them say that an excess-profits-tax bill is all right and, "I will finally vote for one, but we need more time; we want to postpone action; wait until next year, so that we can study the situation more carefully." Of course, experience has taught us, Mr. Chairman, that when you cannot defeat anything, always try to delay and always try to postpone. That is a recognized practice. You want to put off the imposition as long as you possibly can, and your best bet is to try to postpone it in the hope that something will happen and you can ease the pain on your profits in some other manner.

Mr. Chairman, it has been stated repeatedly in public print and on the floor of this House that 200 witnesses appeared, and that most of them were against this proposition.

Mr. Chairman, an actual count shows that there were only 100 witnesses who appeared before the committee, so I would like to make that correction for the purpose of seeing that the record is straight, because the statement that 200 witnesses appeared is not absolutely correct.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield for a question.

Mr. MASON. On that one point, I am authority for stating that there were 200 witnesses who appeared or filed briefs.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Well, I had members of the staff count the number of witnesses who appeared as shown by the record, and I am informed, and I place reliance upon my information, that there were only 100 witnesses who appeared before the committee.

Now, the proposition has been put forth, and perhaps it will be presented in the motion to recommit to be offered by one of the Members of the minority, that we raise all corporate taxes at this time in place of this excess-profits tax. We have to keep in mind, Mr. Chairman, that in the future we will probably have to raise corporate rates of taxation, but we do not want to do it if we can possibly get away from it at this time, because there are many businesses right now that are suffering a loss in revenue because of the defense effort. The allocation of critical materials, the shift in expenditures by the Government for war purposes causes some businesses to be compelled to lay off people, to have a loss in income, and to have a loss in profits. The proposition to raise corporate normal and surtax rates would apply to those companies the same as the war babies, and I do not think it is quite an equitable proposition to make at this time. I personally know of companies that have had to cut their output at least in half because they cannot get the materials. They happen to be engaged in a manufacturing industry that could not get any material allocated to them, so they are getting along with but half of the production, half of the income, and about half of the profits. I do not believe that we should jump onto them right now when this great reservoir of war profits is being made.

How much are we raising in taxes on these war babies? Well, the top rate now on corporations is 45 percent. In our measure we specify that no corporation will be compelled to pay more than 67 percent. Forty-five from sixty-seven leaves twenty-two percent, higher. That is the amount by which we are raising the excess-profits tax. There is a ceiling on it. So when you refer to a 75-percent rate, you give the impression that we are raising the taxes 30 percent, but we are not, because of the over-all ceiling of 67 percent. So it is not quite so painful as some people would try to make it appear.

I was somewhat surprised, and a little bit ashamed, at the testimony that some of these representatitves of industry presented to the committee. Some of them openly and brazenly admitted that business in general would spend lavishly and would squander their money, and spend too much on advertising and in other ways waste their money and run inefficient plants, so that they would not have to pay the Government so much in taxes.

That is an admission I certainly will not go along with. I do not believe American business people in general are that unpatriotic. I think the American businessman would do his best, when we are in a critical, dangerous war situation, to produce as much as he possibly could and do everything he could to keep our forces supplied with the men, materials, clothing, and munitions that are needed. So I do not go along with the proposition that an excess-profits tax creates inefficiency and waste, because there is more patriotism, I think, in the businessman of today than those witnesses indicated.

There was even a witness or two who implied, or even stated openly, that if the excess-profits-tax law were enacted they would not give their wholehearted effort to producing all they possibly could. But I think they simply cannot indict the American businessman in that respect.

A witness appeared before the committee representing the United States Chamber of Commerce. He even went so far as to intimate that in his opinion no additional taxes were needed. He said the budgetary situation is not bad. He said we could get along without putting on excess-profits taxes now, that really there are no war profits being made, and that no excess profits would be made during 1951.

Let me answer that testimony. Actual statistics show that profits of business corporations during the first quarter of 1950 were at the rate of $29,000,000,000. Profits for the second quarter of 1950 were at the rate of $37,200,000,000. In other words, in the second quarter the rate of profits was $8,000,000,000 higher. In the third quarter a very conservative estimate was that profits would be at the rate of $42,000,000,000. So we have a rise from a rate of $29,000,000,000 of profits of corporations in the first quarter to a rate of $42,000,000,000.

How does it happen those extra profits are made? Are they not made as a result of the stepped-up spending? Are not those profits being made as a result of the war situation? We used to call it only a defense situation, but it really is a war situation right now. Certainly those profits are stepped up by reason of the war situation, so that war profits are being made.

We ought to do what we can right here and now to take some of those profits out of war and help us bear this burden, and try to keep the American dollar on a sound basis.

Of course this type of tax is popular with the people. Why should it not be? They know the profits that are being made. They see the prices going up every day and they know who are making the profits, and they know who are raising the prices. Certainly it is a proper tax. You cannot get away from that. It is a just tax and a fair tax.

During World War II we raised $16,000,000,000 through an excess-profits tax. That is a pretty nice sum. It was taken from those concerns that made these extraordinary profits.

In this bill, Mr. Chairman, there are many, many provisions which will give relief to those corporations which have perhaps had an adverse earnings-record during the time that we are using for a base period. Of course every corporation can always use the invested-capital method, or they can use the average of the best 3 out of 4 years from 1946 to 1949, which is much milder than the excess-profits-tax bill that we had during the First World War when we had a 95-percent base and a 95-percent rate. This bill only has an 85-percent base of the 3 best of the 4-year period, and only a 75-cent rate, which is cut down to an over-all limitation of 67 percent.

The committee spent a great deal of time in working out provisions to prevent hardship—to encourage new corporations and encourage small corporations and the expansion of both large and small corporations.

We are considering what I think is a very good tax bill. Secretary of the Treasury Snyder this morning testified before a committee of the other body to the effect that the budget situation looks a little worse now than it did a month or 3 weeks ago and that we will probably have more than a $2,000,000,000 deficit this year. In the light of the recent request for $18,000,000,000 more for defense, what can this little $4,600,000,000 mean when compared to the excess profits now being made of approximately $14,000,000,000 a year above the profits level of the first of this year.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Is this bill as presently drawn going to hit a number of the larger and more profitable corporations which happen to have had very good earning records during the proposed 4-year base period? For the information of the Members I obtained some earning figures this afternoon of General Motors, Chrysler, and United States Steel. I will read the figures. This is net income before the common stock dividends. The information was obtained from Moody's on Industrials.

General Motors in 1946 made over $77,000,000; in 1947 they made over $275,000,000; 1948 they made over $427,000,000; 1949 they made over $643,000,000.

The Chrysler Corp. in 1946 made over $26,000,000; 1947, over $67,000,000; 1948, over $89,000,000; 1949, over $132,000,000.

United States Steel—which has a number of plants in the gentleman's district—in 1946 made over $88,000,000; 1947, over $127,000,000; 1948, over $129,000,000; 1949, over $165,000,000.

The question I ask is, Will this tax bill bring sizable additional revenue from corporations of that type provided that during 1951, 1952, and as long as this proposed legislation is on the statute books, they have comparable earning records?

Mr. EBERHARTER. If those corporations have comparable earning records, they will pay an excess-profits tax by reason of the fact that we are using an 85-percent base. You see we use only 85 percent of their average earnings over the 3 years which they choose for the base period. They necessarily will, by reason of that fact, pay an excess-profits tax. But, in my opinion, the great feature about this bill is that the excess profits will, to some extent, discourage them from raising their prices higher in order to make greater and greater profits. That will help hold down inflation, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Is it not true, as a matter of fact, that this tax bill will really not touch corporations of this sort, if they have a comparable earning record? In other words, the committee proposal will not bring any substantial revenue from the larger and more profitable corporations; instead, the bill puts a greater burden on smaller growth industries?

Mr. EBERHARTER. It is true that corporations that have a very good earning record over the base period of extremely high earnings on their invested capital, will not be hard hit by the exesss-profits tax. There is no question about that. But we have not been able to find any method of reaching them by an excess-profits tax without hurting other less prosperous businesses. The only way to reach them would be to raise the regular corporate rates, or to restrict their credits in some way.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. The weakness of the pattern we have been discussing is that if one concern has a period of high profits and another concern a period of difficulty, the concern operating in a period of difficulty will pay a tremendous excess-profits tax and the other corporation will pay but very little, if they make the same amount of profit in the future.

Mr. EBERHARTER. A person can always conjure up hypothetical extreme cases, which may seldom occur in fact.

Mr. CURTIS. Just one word in that connection. It is the general rule that the more modest the profits have been in the past, the more you get taxed under this bill. If your profits have been exorbitant in the past the less you will be taxed under this bill. A great concern whose stock is watered away down can use the capital investment method and probably pay no tax.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I will say to the gentleman that, in the case of the corporation that has been making a fairly decent profit in the base period, and which has been content with that, if by reason of this war effort it suddenly jumps its profits 100 percent or 200 percent, certainly it should be willing to pay more taxes on the excess profits earned.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] has inadvertently, I think, misstated what he had in his mind, when he referred to the invested-capital method of determining the excess-profits tax. The invested-capital method proposed before the Congress today will not permit determination of an invested-capital credit on the basis of watered stock. That might have been true under the old World War II act, but we have gotten away from the historic method of determining the invested capital in this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman explain that? It was not taken up in the committee.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; it was taken up in the committee, and it was explained at length. I know that anything the gentleman heard in committee he knows more about than I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER] has again expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the one spokesman for the tax bill now before us, other than the representatives of the labor organizations, was Secretary of the Treasury Mr. Snyder. He was the only man in all Government who came before the committee and advocated the imposition of the tax at this time. No one was here from the Bureau of Internal Revenue to tell us how they would go about collecting this money; that was left to our imagination, and it was assumed that we would work out something better than that which took place under excess-profits taxation back in World War I and World War II. On the other hand, Mr. Snyder was very, very careful to distinguish between what Members of this House asked for, an excess-profits tax and a tax on profits. Mr. Snyder talked for a long time about a tax on the profits of corporations, and denied that we should have an excess-profits tax in the sense the Members of Congress referred to this tax in passing our resolution directing the Ways and Means Committee to submit such legislation at this current session of Congress.

Mr. Snyder, I believe, said that we should tax the profits on corporations. I will be very frank with you. What they propose does just that, it taxes normal profits first. Under this bill after you determine your normal earnings back through the years 1946–49 under a formula which is not too complicated, and after your neighborhood corporation determines that it has a normal earning record for those years of, let us say, a hundred thousand dollars, Mr. Snyder proposes to tax a part of this normal profit as excessive. Thus if the corporation earned $100,000 in 1950, or 1951, or 1952, and not a penny more than its normal earnings, nevertheless it should be taxed at an excess-profits rate of 75 percent on 25 percent of that normal earning. The committee changed that to some degree so that today after the corporation determines what its normal earnings are from 1946 to 1949, instead of having to pay a 75-percent rate on 25 percent of its earnings it will have to pay this rate on only 15 percent. The principle is all wrong, and the committee recognized it. But it did not go far enough to correct it by taxing as excessive only that in excess of normal. It is unfair to tax as excess profits that which is normal profits, the profits without which the business cannot continue to exist upon the same level it has existed in the years past. Yet, that is what we are asked to do in this bill right here. After the corporation determines what its normal earnings are through the 1946–49 period it will have to pay an excess-profits tax even though the corporation does not make one penny more than it did in that base period; that is to say, if after earning the $100,000 in the example I cited it should earn something more, it will have to pay an excess-profits tax upon what it earns in addition to the 100 percent and on 15 percent of its normal earnings.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas in just a minute.

Another matter about which I think there is a misconception is this: I have heard criticism that size alone should determine the levy of the excess-profits tax; that just because a corporation is large, it should be taxed heavier, even though the earnings that the very large corporation make percentage-wise are no greater than the earnings of a small corporation. Of course, a large corporation has many more stockholders than has the small corporation; indeed, it is in our very largest corporations where the great mass of our people who own corporate stocks have their money invested: General Motors, Bell Telephone, Chrysler Motors, and dozens upon dozens of others. Keep in mind that when a corporation pays a dividend to its stockholders, if it is unjustly taxed as excess profits, the income of the corporation whether it be a small one or a large one cuts down the dividends which the small investor living in your congressional district would otherwise receive. In a time of inflation such as that in which we are living today, I think it is unjust, inequitable, and undesirable particularly in a war economy when we are calling upon our fellow citizens, large and small, to invest their capital in war-risk industries.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. I have in mind asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania the question whether or not it was not a matter of opinion actually between members of the committee and of people throughout the country as to what constitutes a normal profit? If the gentleman will refer to page 5 of the committee report he will find a majority opinion expressed in the second paragraph on that page as to why these profits in the base period 1946–49 might not be considered normal profits for the purpose of this type of legislation.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The committee majority was of the opinion during 1946 to 1949 there was inflation, and I use that term in the sense there was an abnormal spending of money for war purposes. We are involved in war now and I hate to admit that the money we spent in that period did provide the things to conduct a war.

I say that in reality 1946–49 was as nearly normal as we could have gotten. At all events, the public has been convinced that that period did represent a period of normalcy.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I review here for a moment. If I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania correctly he has told us that the Secretary of the Treasury took the position that the average or normal earnings for the base period, in the case of the $100,000 illustration, of the corporation should be taxed 75 percent of $25,000 of those earnings?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And, for instance, if the corporation earned $125,000, which is $25,000 over the average or normal, $15,000 of the $100,000 should be taxed at 75 percent and $25,000 should be taxed at 75 percent?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Yes. That was not the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. That was the result of committee action.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then the present bill carries the committee action?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. $15,000 at 75 percent and $25,000 at 75 percent instead of the excess at 75 percent?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Yes. As I see it, we are not as far wrong as the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask another question? I should like to have the gentleman's opinion because I think he has a good opinion. He is from a great industrial State and certainly it is production we are up against now if we are up against anything. It is more and more production and I wish it were less and less inflation. In the gentleman's opinion, what effect will the committee formula presented in this bill have on risk capital or investment capital or on the production of war goods or on all three?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Well, first of all the passage of this bill is inflationary. I think by far the greatest effect of the bill will be the retarding effect it will have on any industry which chooses to expand. I consider that the so-called relief provisions in here are entirely unsatisfactory when viewed by any man with capital who seeks an investment where he has safety, and where he has the hope of a return which would justify his investment in a hazardous business. Putting it another way, a man with capital to invest, in looking over the field for investment, would place his money in an industry such as the food industry where there would be a high degree of safety, with little or no risk; where the return would be equal to, or greater than, the probable return if the money is invested in a hazardous war industry, subject as it would be to this excess-profits-tax bill. This is true for the war industry would have its normal earning period, and the rate of return allowed on capital is no more for the hazardous war industry than for the safe and nonhazardous business. The result is that the investors' money seek the safe investment; it is unlikely to take the chance of investment in the war industry where there is no prospect of greater profit.

I think that the passage of this bill will tend to restrict expansion of industries which are vital in this war economy in which we live. I think that that is the real danger in this bill. I do not care if some corporation makes a little more money than normal profits, if, by taking away that little extra bit of money we create a situation wherein that industry cannot expand, or will not expand, and our national defense fails. One result is that we do not have for our men overseas, wherever they may be, the war equipment that is so essential, and which we can only get as industry expands. Of equal importance is necessary capital for industries change over from peacetime production to the manufacture of wartime equipment. All too often we think of war production as involving the construction of a new factory, the creation of a new corporation, and all that, when, in reality, it is our presently established businesses that simply retool and shift over to a wartime economy. That takes a great amount of capital. Either they have to try to get the capital from private investors or they have to go to the Government with outstretched hands and request it. I do not want Government control in our war industries, or elsewhere. It kills production.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If they go to the Government, the Government has only one place to get it, and that is either to increase the tax load or borrow it.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And if they borrow it, that means more inflation.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Because certainly your situation now is such that present financing is primarily going through the bank portfolios, and if a man wants to be to the least degree sensible, he will have to admit it to himself that the majority of the new financing will go to the bank portfolios, and that that in itself is almost sheer inflation.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Yes, and the passage of this bill in taxing these corporations at such an extremely high rate will remove some of the money they need for expansion, which they now have, and at the same time make it less likely that they can borrow the money to replace capital needs.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is there in this bill, if anything, which enables the person who does have the courage to build a new plant for the production of war goods or peace goods, or whatever you want to call it—I do not make any distinction between them—with respect to amortization over a short period of time?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I think we put nothing in this particular bill with reference to that. We have an existing law providing that an expanding industry may get a certificate from Government and amortize in 5 years.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But there is nothing new in this.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. No; nothing new in this.

Now I want to talk about our hearings for a moment, because that certainly is a significant point. We had before the committee about 100 businessmen, representing 350,000 corporations in this country. They represented associations, chambers of commerce, and other business organizations. The significant point is that of the 100 who testified there was not one who thought that the excess-profits tax along the line suggested by the Treasury was a proper thing to impose upon industry at this time. It is significant that out of that 350,000 corporations represented in those associations, only about 70,000 of them will ever be subject to the excess-profits tax. So, you have 270,000 or 280,000 corporations not subject to the excess-profits tax appearing here through their representatives asking that some other scheme be used to provide the increase in revenues which they all recognize as necessary. They are willing to assume their share of the tax, but they do not want the economy stifled by an unjust and unworkable tax. Keep it clear in your minds that every witness said that we should collect not four billion but from five to six billion dollars at this time from industry, saying that the excess-profits tax was not the right way to do it and adding that they had an alternative to offer. I regret very much that our great committee did not do our duty when we refused those gentlemen permission to present to us the alternatives which they had thought out as being a proper basis for the imposition of a tax to provide revenue today. The committee should have welcomed their suggestions, instead of limiting them to 15 minutes to point out defects in the Treasury's proposal obvious to all.

As I said earlier, the so-called relief provision of this bill designed to take care of growth companies is utterly unfair and unsatisfactory. They are impossible to operate to the satisfaction of all our people, which means to enable the growth companies to grow as they should.

Mr. Snyder appeared today before the Senate Finance Committee and talked about the bill which is before us. He agreed with it in general, in effect agreeing with a bill which was largely written down in the Treasury Department. I believe that is true because he picked out only two things which he says are undesirable features of the bill. He says:

> Although the liberalized features of the House bill generally accord with the views of the Department, the bill contains some provisions which tend to create rather than alleviate inequities.

Those two provisions to which he refers as being undesirable are the two which the majority of the House Committee on Ways and Means thought to be very important if we are to avoid inflation. One has to do with the question of utilities; your electric light, your gas, and your water services, which are charged to you under rates established by the regulatory bodies of the Federal Government or the respective States.

The members of the Committee on Ways and Means decided that where a regulatory body imposed a limit above which the utilities might not earn without a reduction in rate it would be unfair to impose an excess-profits tax unless the tax did not begin until that level had been reached. The committee so decided that the tax should not apply below earnings of 6 percent. Now, Mr. Snyder says that is all wrong, that utilities should be taxed on earnings even though less than allowed by the regulatory bodies.

The answer is that if you take any money from a regulated utility as an excess-profits tax, $100,000, let us say, and then under the regulatory bodies practice you allow that corporation to regain that $100,000, your consumers are going to pay increased rates. They will pay in higher rates not $100,000 but four times that, or $400,000. It is highly inflationary. It will increase the cost of public utilities to the consumers. The provision in the bill today should be kept there notwithstanding Mr. Snyder's recommendation.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Does the bill provide a restriction on institutional advertising? By that I mean if the Chrysler Corp., say, turns to tank production and it wants to advertise that some day it will be back manufacturing automobiles, is it restricted on such advertising?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. May I suggest that the gentleman refer to page 58 of the report, under section 449. I have been advised that the language in the bill is a repetition of the language contained in the World War II Act.

Mr. BENTSEN. The gentleman means there is no change in the law as it was in World War II?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I have been informed that there is no change in that provision.

The great aircraft industry made no money during the years 1946 to 1949. The great electronics industry made no profit during those years in any substantial amount which would justify those earnings as a fair and equitable base upon which their future earnings might be judged. In the television industry there were losses through 1946, 1947, and 1948. There was a substantial gain in 1949, and a very heavy increase in 1950.

Considering the television industry, about which the gentleman asked a moment ago, 75 percent of the net income of the television industry in 1950 will be subjected to the excess-profits tax rate of 75 percent under this bill. The average for all industry is as follows: Thirty-eight percent of the net income of all the corporations in the country will be taxed at the 75 percent rate. Consequently, the television industry, upon which we must depend for a large part of our expansion in the electronics field under war pressure, will be taxed on three-quarters of its income, that is, 75 percent. This is unfair and prejudicial to an essential wartime industry.

The very industry which must expand and toward which we want to attract capital is being penalized under this bill because of the relief provisions not going far enough. Under previous laws we had a section which has been very greatly discredited. It was known as section 722, a section designed to provide relief to any industry which felt that it did not come within the average earning base in a fair and equitable way and to provide relief for the industry which, through some unanticipated hardship, had not been able to earn money during the base period. There is no section 722 in this bill, and these relief provisions have been designed to make section 722 unnecessary. I do not like section 722. Why, today—6 years after the excess-profits tax law has lapsed—there remain 22,000 cases of the 50,000 arising under that act, unsettled, involving $5,000,000,000. That is almost one-half of the money which was collected under the excess-profits-tax law. Yet without a workable section 722, there is no way whatever for business to turn for relief if it does not fit exactly in the strait jacket imposed in this bill.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. We had testimony from one prominent businessman that he had engaged the time of 40 people for one whole year just preparing the case, and even then he did not get any relief.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Yes, he represented one of the large enterprises, as the gentleman from New York states, which had 40 men engaged for a year to prepare their case. Incidentally it has not yet been settled.

Think of the thousands upon thousands of dollars involved here, and then realize how utterly impossible it is for a small-business man to do the necessary and proper work to present his case before one of these Government agencies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COMBS].

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a few general observations on this bill. In the first place neither I nor, I am sure, any other member of the Committee on Ways and Means would contend that this is a perfect piece of legislation. If you or I waited until we could find the perfect tax bill to vote for, we never would vote for one because there is no such animal. This economy of ours is, we might say, woefully and frightfully constructed. No kind of law which taxes people on their income, whether as individuals or as corporations can possibly fit equitably and justly in all situations. It is beyond the ingenuity of the human mind to create such a law. We had particular difficulty in writing this bill. This bill, incidentally, was written by the Committee on Ways and Means and not by the Treasury as some opposition speakers have charged. But we did have great difficulty in writing the bill because of the limitations of time. The bill is 146 pages long. Tax legislation is exceedingly complicated and difficult to write. Yet, our committee came back here November 15 under what amounted to a mandate from the Congress itself to have the bill ready for the Congress to consider when it reconvened on the 27th of November, or as shortly thereafter as possible. In that connection I want to comment a bit on the observations made by a couple of Members who preceded me, including the distinguished ranking minority member, the gentleman from New York, for whom I have the greatest regard, criticizing the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means for refusing to explore or hear testimony upon various alternative methods of taxation. I would remind the gentleman that in the first place last September the Congress enacted a tax-revision bill which increased the taxes both of corporations and of individuals. We made that bill retroactive as to corporations, to July 1, and we made it effective as to all other taxpayers as of October 1. Because the Members were not satisfied that we had not included a provision for an excess-profits tax, and in view of the world situation which was developing, we voted to come back on November 27 and in substance add to what we were then doing, an excess-profits-tax provision. We were not directed to explore other forms of taxation. Also, the gentleman knows, and every member of our committee, and I think every Member of the House knows that had we turned aside into the complicated field of general taxation to hear testimony, and to attempt to weigh it and write a tax bill of a general revision nature, the result would have been no excess-profits-tax bill at all and thus we would have lost any chance to capture a part of excess profits for the last half of 1950. In all kindness I say that there were various moves made on the other side that rather indicated that the minority wanted us to wait until next year at least; that they did not want any excess-profits-tax bill at this time. We felt on our side of the table that we had been ordered by the Congress to write such a bill for its consideration, and we rested under the responsibility of tendering such a measure to the membership. We have done our best. And you have the bill before you.

Now let us notice this matter of the criticism of the way the committee conducted hearings. My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON], who has just preceded me, was critical that we could have received the testimony of 300 or 400 corporate representatives, and that we listened to only 200 or less. I think it was 8 days of hearings, the maximum time we felt we could give to the proposition of hearings, that we listened to the testimony of witnesses. A little more than 1 day of that time was taken up by the representative of the Treasury, and, with the exception of two or three witnesses who were heard briefly, 6½ or 7 days of time was given over to listening to the representatives of various corporations who were objecting to an excess-profits tax or criticizing the provisions of the proposals—a very fair hearing, I should say. We might have been able to hear the testimony of 400 or 500 representatives of corporations. Only they, incidentally, were affected by an excess-profits-tax bill. But they have their trade associations. They have their paid agents, but the people have none. Those whose sons are dying in Korea have no special representatives here. The little taxpayer who is having his taxes upped by this same Congress had no way to be here. He had only you and me here to represent him. That is all. I think we did a fair job listening to the complaints of those who object to an excess-profits tax. We have attempted to avoid inequities to which our attention was called. We have written this bill, and I think it is a very conservative bill; and I, for one, plugged for that kind of a bill. I do not mind saying so. We were confronted with the proposition of trying to frame a law that would reach only the excess profits of those who were profiting largely from the abnormal conditions, while at the same time avoiding hurting many, many businesses that are not profiting abnormally or perhaps are even making reduced profits because of the present emergency. We had in mind the little business people, thousands of whom have started their business since the end of the last war, who have borrowed capital and have been trying to expand, during these last 3 or 4 years as they established their businesses, and have made no profits at all, or only small profits, and who have heavy obligations to meet, both in interest and in principal payments. We painstakingly wrote into this law provision after provision intended, as best we could write it, to safeguard their interests.

In the first place, no corporation will be liable for the excess-profits tax unless it makes in excess of $25,000 net profit.

That is a provision that automatically gives the benefit of complete exemption from excess-profits taxation to the little corporation.

In addition to that the bill gives liberal credits on borrowed capital for all businesses.

In addition, the bill increases the percentage allowance on interest payments for corporations.

Also the bill contains alternative provisions in the case of corporations that had no earnings experience base. They may take the average income percentage over the base period of the industry as a whole and apply it to their capital investment as a base.

I do not have time to enumerate all of the many provisions the committee painstakingly worked out in the time we had and wrote into the bill in an attempt to help the little fellow, as well be fair to all corporations.

I would not impugn the motives, but I think the judgment of the Members who are criticizing this bill may be questioned. It so happens that they came forward, or the gentleman from New York did, with a proposal as an alternative to the excess-profits tax. What was it? It is a matter of record. He proposed that in lieu of this excess profits as the majority have fashioned it to capture profits from the high income fellow while relieving as much as possible the corporation of modest income, he came forth with a provision that would have upped the corporate rate to 50 percent on every corporation with a limit of 55 percent over all. This would mean that the smallest corporation, the one with the lowest earnings, whatever its earnings were, would have had one-half of those earnings taken, but the big corporation—and I know of one which earned over six hundred million after the payment of taxes—would have paid a maximum of 5 percent on its take. Those profits were made at a time of great and dire distress; they were made on products sold to people who had to buy them because for 5 years they had not been able to get them; they were able to charge what the traffic would bear and put the money in the bank.

I hold no prejudice against the big corporations; I am not saying that we should single them out; I have made no such argument in committee, in public, or anywhere else. But I am saying to you that those who have been in position because of the need of their industry or the product they sold, the scarcity of their product, and with the privilege of charging what they pleased, should not object that they shall have to dig into their profit level a long way down to help ease the burdens and help defend the Nation in which they had the privilege of private enterprise and private ownership, and within which they have been permitted to thrive and to make those great profits.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORD. On the basis of a 10-percent increase in the so-called normal rates, would not a corporation like General Motors, Chrysler, or United States Steel—and I have the figures of their earnings for the last 4 years—pay more taxes than in the present excess-profits proposal that is before us?

Mr. COMBS. That could be true. I have not the time to figure it out. It would depend on several factors.

Mr. FORD. In other words, you cannot say that this bill will hurt the more profitable corporations which have established excellent earning records in the last 4 years? A flat 10-percent increase in the corporate tax rate will bring more revenue from corporations of that type.

Mr. COMBS. Let me answer the gentleman right there: If you put the corporate rate up to 50 percent, as the gentleman suggests, you would be hitting not only those very few who have built these large profits but also you would increase to 50 percent the normal tax on every corporation, whatever its earnings may have been, even though they were as low as 1 percent of its investment. It would not tax excess profits at all.

This excess-profits bill is, I hope, by no means the last word on the subject. The Congress, come next spring, is going to have to restudy the whole field of taxation. In writing this bill we have in mind that we were writing it in a way so that it would be related back and the big companies you talk about might not have been hurt at all, but we were very careful that the many thousands of businesses of moderate income be not indiscriminately hurt by a rate suddenly related back.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. Is it not impossible to answer the question of the gentleman from Michigan categorically without knowing what the profits of these companies will be in 1951 or 1952 when this bill may be in effect?

Mr. COMBS. That is true.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly an excess-profits tax bill in those years might bring in a lot more money than a 10-percent increase in present tax liability.

Mr. COMBS. That is possible. That would depend on the application of 85 percent of the base that we have set up.

Mr. MILLS. It would depend on what they make in 1951 and 1952.

Mr. COMBS. Yes; and on that base. Mind you, had we not dropped that base down to 85, those same companies you speak of with their earnings over 1946, 1947, 1948, and 1949 would have been able to earn up to the present level and very largely without paying a dime of excess-profits tax.

Mr. FORD. I would like to read these figures for United States Steel for 1946 to 1949. I am convinced the gentleman will admit a flat 10-percent increase, assuming that United States Steel has the same earnings in the future, would take more of a tax bite out of those corporations than this so-called excess-profits tax proposal.

Mr. COMBS. That is possible.

Mr. FORD. You are trying to get revenue from the most profitable corporations who have made and probably will make lots of money. The 10 percent normal tax rate increase is the better way of getting at that potential Federal revenue.

Mr. COMBS. Let us drive a peg at that point. If taxation were that simple, we could have done the job in one day, sir, very easily and very simply. Let me draw a distinction between an excess-profits tax as distinguished from an across-the-board rate. I would not favor such a thing normally when the law of supply and demand controlled. It can be used properly in time of an upset economy when earnings opportunities are not the same and when supply and demand do not control prices and income. In those cases it is a type of tax you can relate to the cases of high-income producers and to that extent keep the tax lower on the fellow with lower income. Mind you, in times of stress, such as we have now, the manufacturer of luxury goods, the manufacturer of products for private consumption that use critical materials and thousands of businesses in this Nation make less money in wartime and in time of distress than in normal times. We must keep those people in mind, too, sir. If we would up the rate too much across the board, as the gentleman suggests, we would put a lot of them out of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman from Texas answer this question: Does he think that the profits say of General Motors for the last 4 years have been excessive, and these are the figures before common stock dividends: 1946 $77,000,000 plus, 1947 $275,000,0000 plus, 1948 $427,000,000 plus, and 1949 $643,000,000 plus. Are those profits excessive?

Mr. COMBS. I am not going to attempt in this brief time, and with the limited knowledge I have, to determine whose profits are excessive; but I want to say that the $450,000,000 and the $643,000,000 the gentleman is talking about is not hay.

Mr. FORD. I agree with the gentleman, but assuming that that corporation does make the same kind of profit in the next taxable year, General Motors will not be taxed a great deal more by the tax law that the House may approve in the next few days.

Mr. COMBS. It would pay considerably more. In planning a tax you have to plan it with a great deal of care. You will notice that I carefully refrained from calling corporations by name. We have to plan not merely with respect to United States Steel and General Motors but with respect to thousands and thousands of corporations to whom the same yardstick would have to be applied. That is one of the difficulties in writing a tax bill. You cannot single out just a few for special treatment. Also those corporations which will have some millions left with which to operate after we are through taxing them are not going to be hurt. It looks to me like, to answer the gentleman's question in a general way, we can dip into those $400,000,000, and $600,000,000 profits of any corporation that has them for a large sum without hurting them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to enter into a general discussion of this bill. I have a carefully prepared, carefully thought out and carefully documented statement that I propose to present, and I shall not yield for any interruptions until I am through. Then I shall be glad to enter into a free-for-all.

Mr. Chairman, we have before us for debate and action a "pig in a poke" because not one Member of this House can possibly know what is in this bill. Anyone voting for it under those circumstances must close his eyes, hold his nose, and hope for the best when he votes.

This bill will do just the opposite to what the American people expect and want it to do. They expect it to check inflation; it will cause more inflation. They expect it to skim off excess war profits; it will allow General Motors to continue to earn excessively high profits, but will take 67 percent of the profits that small struggling corporations may make if those small corporations did not make profits during the base period.

Mr. Chairman, our committee held public hearing on the subject of an excess-profits tax. Two hundred witnesses were heard or filed briefs. One hundred and ninety-seven of them were opposed to the tax. Three of the witnesses testified in favor of the tax—one representing the CIO, one representing the A. F. of L. and one representing the electrical workers union. The opponents of the tax made the following points against it:

First. It is an inflationary tax, not a deflationary one. It encourages the manufacturer to disregard costs of production and to pay more for both raw products and labor because the increased costs largely come out of Uncle Sam's cut of the profits.

Second. It discourages efficiency in production and encourages inefficiency, because 75 cents out of every dollar made above the so-called normal profit has to go to Uncle Sam.

Third. It takes away from a corporation the incentive for business expansion and stepped-up production—two very desirable things in a war economy.

Fourth. All former experience with an excess-profits tax proves that it is impossible to draft one that will treat all business enterprises fairly and equitably.

In lieu of an excess-profits tax these witnesses proposed an increase in corporate tax rates, a slight increase in individual income-tax rates, and a renegotiation law that would take away all excess profits from war contracts. Such a tax program would bring in more money to the Treasury than the proposed excess-profits tax and it would do it more easily and equitably.

Mr. Chairman, under questioning, Eric Johnston, representing the Motion Pictures Industry of America, stated:

An excess-profits tax is extremely inflationary in its effect upon our economy. * * * It will discourage, not encourage, business expansion and stepped-up production. * * * Needed revenue for the Treasury can be secured more readily and with less trouble by simply increasing corporation surtaxes.

Mr. Ellsworth C. Alvord, chairman of the committee on Federal finance, United States Chamber of Commerce, in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, said:

If this committee passes the proposed excess-profits tax, the results will be the exact opposite to those desired by the committee.

Under questioning Mr. Alvord admitted that his general statement when translated into specific language would read:

You want deflation; you will get inflation. You want revenue; you will get little revenue. You want business expansion and increased production; yet you remove all incentive for securing either by the passage of this bill.

Bradley Dewey, president of Dewey Chemical Co., Cambridge, Mass., summed his testimony up as follows:

One of the most encouraging phenomena of the postwar years was the number of returning young men who started a new business. Many of these have not as yet become profitable. Today they are just turning the corner. These new businesses must not be crippled by an excess-profits tax which is a tax upon healthy growth.

Renegotiation of war contracts can stop the war profiteer. Let renegotiation tax away actual excess war profits but keep our basic economy healthy so that the young men who are coming along may have the same opportunities to organize and promote new companies and new products as their predecessors. Tax the profits out of war by renegotiation.

Mr. Chairman, new enterprises usually start out with risk capital and borrowed money. New enterprises involve considerable risk and are accompanied by a high mortality rate. This makes a return higher than that allowed on invested capital a necessity in order to attract venture capital. In addition to the risk capital invested in a new business, practically every new business finds it necessary to borrow money. This debt must be paid off out of what is left of the profits after taxes have been paid. An excess-profits tax will make it very difficult, if not impossible, to pay off debt.

Inability to attract risk capital and inability to pay off debt will mean the end of new enterprise. This, in turn, means the end of employment opportunities afforded by new industry, which again in turn cuts off potential sources of tax revenue for the United States Government. In the event the present international crisis lasts for 10 years, or 20 years, as some of our people believe it will, it will mean the complete elimination of new business. This will upset the economic balance between small business and big business; it will destroy employment opportunities for perhaps an entire generation of our young people; and over a period of years it will provide less in total taxes for the Treasury. Therefore, this tax will defeat its own purpose.

Mr. Robert C. Tait, president of the Stromberg-Carlson Co., of Rochester, N. Y., gave convincing testimony to the effect that an excess-profits tax such as the tax proposed in this bill will stifle industrial growth; foster waste and inefficiency; put a premium upon overcapitalization, and a penalty upon brains, energy, and enterprise; discourage new ventures and confirm old ventures in their monopolies; feed inflation; and be discriminatory and unfair.

Mr. Tait's prediction of these dire results came directly out of his observation and experience with the excess profits tax of World War II—after which this one is patterned. Mr. Tait quoted Fred Vinson, Secretary of the Treasury in 1945, as saying:

The difficulty is that calling profits excessive does not make them excessive and calling profits normal does not make them normal.

Mr. Chairman, it would be folly for us to finance a program to build up the war strength of America by a tax that will weaken the economic and financial strength of America. And that is exactly what this tax will do. We can win the all-out wars of today only by mobilizing our full strength—military strength, economic strength, and financial strength. The advocates of this tax do not realize that after 5 or 10 years of such a tax, corporate enterprise would take on the characteristics of our bureaucratic government—little incentive for improvement, little fear of waste, and little or no pressure from competition—because profits under this bill would largely depend upon having a big tax credit to start out with, not upon a dynamic force to produce growth and efficiency. As one witness before our committee put it, "Under an excess profits tax efficiency is worth only 25 cents on the dollar, and waste costs only 25 cents on the dollar." An excess profits tax therefore becomes an invitation to extravagance and waste in corporate management, whereas what we need most today is maximum efficiency and stepped-up production.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are to have an excess profits tax law, with all its inequities, its injustices, and its bad effects upon the economic and financial life of the Nation—and it looks from the way this pig in a poke is being jammed through the House that we are to have such a law—then I want to call your attention to a glaring inequity presently existing under our tax laws, an inequity that will be tremendously aggravated by the passage of this excess profits tax. I refer to the tax-free status of what is known as section 101 corporations.

This bill has it in a clause that specifically exempts section 101 corporations from payment of this excess profits tax. Many of these exempt corporations are engaged in the same sorts of business as the corporations that this excess profits tax bill proposes to tax. They make profits of the same kind. If taxable corporations make excess profits, these exempt corporations will make excess profits of the same kind. They will make war profits of the same kind. There is no guesswork about this. We know that it is true because we have the precedent of what happened during World War II.

According to the official figures of the Farm Credit Administration—report 157, Statistics of Farmers' Marketing and Purchasing Cooperatives, March 1950, page 7—the business volume of cooperatives doubled between 1942 and 1945, the years of the war. Total volume, according to this official source, was $2,240,000,000 in 1942; twice that amount, or $5,645,000,000, in 1945. I have good reason to believe that actual business of the cooperatives was vastly more than these figures show, but a tremendous increase in business due to the war is fully established even by these official figures. Since volume doubled, it is fair to assume that earnings also doubled. By the method of computation and rates which were used in connection with the excess-profits take of that time, and is proposed again in the bill under discussion, the Treasury would have collected a substantial amount of money. But no tax was paid by the cooperatives. Instead, an equivalent of the money that competitors were forced to pay in taxes was plowed back into the co-ops' businesses, permitting them to expand by leaps and bounds.

In 1948–49—still by their own figures which omit so many items of operation that they represent probably only a little more than half the actual amount—the cooperatives did $9,320,000,000 of business. Allowing them a normal rate of profit and giving them the 85 percent credit which his excess-profits tax bill proposes, their excess-profits tax would amount to $63,000,000, enough to buy a goodly number of the guns and tanks and planes that our boys need in Korea.

Mr. Chairman, I can find no possible legitimate excuse for the continued exemption of the various tax-exempt organizations and corporations, whether from the proposed excess-profits tax or from the normal high tax that is imposed upon their competitors. We are entering upon a period of extraordinary expenditures for defense and perhaps for war. We are imposing taxes at wartime rates. But while we are saying to some corporations that they shall not be permitted to make a profit out of the business they do during this time of national emergency, we are saying to certain other groups—directly competitive with the first group—that they may keep the full 100 percent of their profits to do with as they please. That just is not right. It does not make sense.

In the revenue bill of 1950 we made a beginning toward closing certain loopholes through which business was being done without the payment of taxes. We told the colleges, the charities, and the foundations that they must pay the regular rate of corporate income tax on competitive commercial business. At that time we deferred consideration of the taxation of mutual-savings banks, building-and-loan associations, cooperatives, and other mutuals until the tax bill of 1951. In January I shall again introduce a bill to tax the business earnings of all tax-exempts, both as a matter of justice to other business and as a way of adding an estimated $750,000,000 a year of new revenue to the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, the Government is offering the full protection of its arms to all business. It does not limit its protection to regular corporations and partnerships, though it does require them to pay for what they get. As a matter of decency and patriotism, the tax-exempts should willingly come forward and pay the same taxes that other companies pay. I have heard of only one, however, that has even made such a gesture—and I am told that other cooperative officials contemptuously declare that Union Equity Grain Exchange of Oklahoma is crazy to be paying anything at all.

I hope that the Senate Finance Committee will strike out of the bill now before us under a closed rule the provision that specifically exempts section 101 corporations from the payment of this excess profits tax, and that the Senate will write into the bill a specific provision requiring all section 101 corporations to pay the same excess-profits tax as their competitors.

That, Mr. Chairman, would be only a start in the right direction. We can then finish the job by taxing all their earnings, in the regular tax bill of 1951, as promised by Senator GEORGE, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, the Wall Street Journal, comparing this year's profits with last year's, reports 419 leading industrial and commercial corporations increased their earnings for the third quarter of 1950 ending last September 30 by 53 percent. Remember this is 53 percent in just 1 year. Furthermore, the National City Bank of New York, in its November bulletin, reported that war profits are not as yet a major factor.

We did not delay sending our soldiers to Korea until we had a mighty military organization with the most perfect of modern instruments of war and with every soldier carefully trained for a period of a year or longer. That was simply out of question. Well, we should not now wait to tax excessive profits from the war emergency until we have the most perfect excess-profits tax law. This Nation is at war. We should pass this excess-profits tax by December 6 so that the other body will have time to act on it by December 20. This will allow a couple of days for conference between the House and Senate to iron out differences. By working on this timetable, we shall have an excess-profits tax law ready for the President's signature before Christmas.

Earlier this year, this Congress added $3,000,000,000 in revenue per year from individual taxpayers of this country and only one billion and a half in additional revenue from corporate income taxes. Were we to fail to pass an excess-profits tax bill before the end of this year, retroactive to last July 1, we would be properly subject to criticism.

Our desire in passing the bill now being considered is to bring into better balance taxation burdens against individuals and against corporations. The facts are, we have not been calling upon the corporations of this country to contribute their fair share of the vast amounts necessary for national defense. Regardless of what any gentleman may say, this Nation is at war. Furthermore, it is not a war of our own choosing. The dictators of the Soviet Union are waging war against us by proxy. Let us try for an equality of sacrifice. We should not want to tolerate war profiteering at a time when our young men are being compelled to make the supreme sacrifice overseas. Let us try to prevent any war millionaires to emerge from this war. This particular bill may not accomplish that, but it is a step in the right direction. The increase in corporate profits this year is the largest in the history of the United States.

During the third quarter of 1950, corporate profits in this country amounted to $42,000,000,000. It is safe to assert that this year corporate profits will total $10,000,000,000 more than last year. Yet enactment of this bill into law will take only approximately $3,000,000,000 of that sum to help defend this Nation against aggression of the Soviet Union.

Our President has concluded that were we to provide for $4,000,000,000 per year additional revenue by an excess-profits tax, no hardship whatever would be imposed on corporations. I assert that this very moderate bill should be passed in the House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote. I assert that even with more drastic legislation providing for an excess-profits tax, our corporations would be able to maintain present rates of dividends to stockholders and retain record amounts of earnings for corporate reinvestment. With the enactment of this bill into law, corporations of this country will still be able to devote next year more than $20,000,000,000 to dividends to their stockholders and for reinvestment to expand their corporate businesses. This leaves to corporations an amount which equals the record of 1948 and exceeds all other years. This after payment of all taxes, including excess-profits taxes.

Many Congressmen questioned the fairness of raising the tax burden of individuals earning less than $5,000 a year by more than 20 percent. Also, of increasing taxes on small corporations and yet failing to impose an excess-profits tax against abnormal corporate profits. I feel particularly sorry for young married people already hard pressed by the high cost of living. They may properly resent an increase in their own taxes if we permit abnormal profits of corporations to go untaxed. We have worked hard to prepare this bill. It is a good bill. We shall pass it tomorrow despite opposition and attempts to kill the bill by recommitting to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Last October Congress made a commitment to pass an excess-profits tax.

Minority party leaders seek to prevent passage of a tax bill this year by a motion to recommit. Republican strength in the coming Eighty-second Congress will be greater than in the present Congress. Big business hopes to escape higher tax rates for the last half of 1950. The prize is a big one. Third-quarter 1950 profits are by far the largest in United States history.

Opponents of an excess-profits tax seek to place most of the burden of taxes, necessary for our war effort, upon individual income taxpayers. Also, they advocate enactment of a Federal sales tax on manufactured articles. This would be a tax on consumption.

The question is: Will people insist that the cost of our armament be borne on the basis of ability to pay?

Reactionary Republican leaders endorsed the proposal of the United States Chamber of Commerce as a substitute for an excess-profits tax against abnormal corporate profits. This program proposes an over-all corporate tax rate of 50 percent. This is not much higher than the present maximum rate of 45 percent. Then they propose to raise another four or five billion dollars per year by imposing additional excise, or sales taxes. These are taxes against consumers which fall most heavily upon those least able to pay.

In addition, they propose lowering the present $600 exemption. This would penalize low-income families. The facts are, the present exemption is too low and should be increased instead of lowered.

Reactionary Republican leaders—and their power will be increased in the next Congress—propose to make the little fellow pay while the big fellow who profits so heavily from our defense program will contribute less than his proper share.

Then they propose, they say, to slice $6,000,000,000 off nonmilitary expenditures. That all sounds very good. What are the plain facts?

Total nonmilitary expenditures of the Federal Government approximate $12,000,000,000 per year. The United States Chamber of Commerce proposes to whack them almost in half. In other words, to slash at things the Government has come to do for its people. Social welfare, Federal aid to education, public health, public power and reclamation projects, and to cut social security, instead of expanding and liberalizing it. President Truman terms these expenditures as investments in the future of our country, yet if all these welfare projects were stopped altogether only $4,000,000,000 per year would be saved. Then if housing were eliminated, adding another billion dollars, that would still fall short of $6,000,000,000. Our Government does a great many things big and little—for example, for aviation by providing facilities, for shipping through subsidies to maintain a merchant marine, and for public utilities and other businesses loans through various agencies, including the RFC. All these essential Government activities come within the term nonmilitary expenditures. Were these to be eliminated, we would be living in another and different America.

I hope I have made it clear I disagree with the United States Chamber of Commerce's position. I do favor imposing an excess-profits tax now against abnormal corporate profits retroactive to last July. This is really a moderate proposal. It will not injure any corporation. The highest tax liability possible is 67 percent on total corporate earnings including corporation income, surtaxes, and excess-profits taxes. As an administration supporter who believes in defending against dictatorship aggression on a pay-as-you-go basis, I support this bill. We shall pass it. I hope that the United States Senate will pass our bill by December 20.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JONAS. Does the gentleman contend that all of the evils we are going to be confronted with concerning our economic and financial difficulties can be cured by this particular bill?

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman does not make any such claim. No, indeed, this bill is not any cure-all. The gentleman does not contend that this Nation is afflicted with evils except the terror of Communist aggression from abroad. The gentleman who is speaking, the "lame duck" Congressman from Ohio, says that in this Nation we have gone a great way and under a great leadership since that black Saturday in 1933 when Franklin D. Roosevelt first became President.

Mr. JONAS. Can the gentleman answer the question yes or no?

Mr. YOUNG. I have answered the gentleman's question. My answer is "No"; that this does not cure everything and is not a cure-all. I say that this is too modest and too moderate an excess-profits tax.

Mr. JONAS. Assuming that the gentleman takes the figure he cited, namely, $42,000,000,000 for the base in effect after this bill becomes law, how much tax would we raise under this excess-profits tax on that particular figure? How much would it amount to, approximately? Can the gentleman give us some idea?

Mr. YOUNG. I am afraid that this will yield only a little better than $3,400,000,000 per year.

Mr. JONAS. I take it that the gentleman is aware of the fact that the President is asking for about $20,000,000,000 more.

Mr. YOUNG. Yes.

Mr. JONAS. This would not be a cure-all for all the tax problems at the present time then?

Mr. YOUNG. No. I might be frank with the gentleman and state I am very sorry I cannot be back with the gentleman next year. There will be another tax bill next year. Taxes will go higher, not lower.

Mr. JONAS. I am sorry, too, that the gentleman will not be back with us. I can say that sincerely.

Mr. YOUNG. I sincerely thank the distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE].

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all of us today fear that a distinguished visitor has come to our country with an umbrella in his hand. I hope, if he has, it is merely because of the rain in Washington, and that it is not the umbrella that Mr. Chamberlain carried to Munich.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot afford appeasement. Should we allow the conference between President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee to sink to the low level of the Munich conference between the then Prime Minister Chamberlain and Adolf Hitler, we will have administered a deathblow to the United Nations. Should we agree to withdraw from Korea, we might as well withdraw from Europe because we will have issued an open invitation to the Soviet forces to advance at will wherever they will.

Mr. Chairman, peace, not simply in our time but for all time, is a jewel of great price. The price involves great sacrifice and possibly involves the acceptance of momentary losses in order to enjoy its more enduring blessings. If we are unwilling to pay the price, we should not complain at our dismal future. Let us not have international appeasement; nor can we afford to sacrifice principle on the home front merely in behalf of expediency.

The Ways and Means Committee has brought to us today a bill providing for a tax on excess profits. I do not know a Member of this House who does not want to take for the operation of the Government a large share of those profits that are secured as the result of war. I believe most people think this is a sound policy. I agree with that philosophy. But the bill before us contains a most unfortunate provision in which it seeks to do retroactively a thing that we all agree should be done but only after due notice.

I have never believed in writing contracts after they were fulfilled. The time to write a contract is before either party acts. I think that when we write a contract on behalf of the Government we should carry it out, whether or not it is advantageous to the Government. When we write public laws we write contracts with the people. Therefore, to the extent that this bill seeks to tax retroactively earnings that were not subject to taxation at the time they were earned, it seems to me we are doing a dishonest and an unfair thing. I regret that this bill should contain such a provision because, on the whole, as I have said, we must all agree as to the soundness of the philosophy of an excess-profits tax.

I know we cannot expect to get everything just as we would like it in a tax bill. I know there are differences of opinion. Since we are faced with the actualities of the rule, which requires us to take the bill all or nothing, I know nothing that we in this body can do except to take the unfortunate provisions along with the fair provisions, and hope that another body of this Congress will see to it that the unfair provisions are stricken from the bill.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. This Congress has many times in the past written tax bills retroactively. We often write a tax bill, and Congress passes it, retroactive for the entire previous year.

Mr. POAGE. I know it has, but that did not make it right. It was just as wrong in the past as it is today. The fact that somebody else has done a wrong does not entitle me to go out and do a wrong.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Practically all tax bills are retroactive.

Mr. POAGE. No; practically all tax bills are not retroactive.

Mr. EBERHARTER. If the gentleman will look over the history of the income-tax bills, he will find that they are passed retroactive to the first of the year in which they are passed.

Mr. POAGE. If the gentleman were to show me that since the beginning of this Nation we had been doing wrong he still would not convince me that I should be a party to doing a wrong in the future, when I know it is wrong and when it has been called to my attention. I call to the attention of the House this afternoon the fact that we are doing a wrong, that we are violating the sanctity of contract, that we are doing through the force of government a thing that we would not countenance on the part of individuals. We are also doing an unwise thing. In our anxiety to get the excess profits that have been made in recent months we serve notice on business that it can have no security or assurance as to the extent of its tax burdens. I fear that we are but killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. I cannot believe that it is ever profitable in public affairs, either local or international, to sell the security of the future for the profit of the moment.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does not my good friend agree that these war profits were made commencing shortly after the Korean incident and that for the past 6 months the corporations have already made great profits?

Mr. POAGE. Yes; and last summer the gentleman from Texas who is now addressing you voted to impose an excess-profits tax on those profits at that time. Certainly I agree they should have been taxed then. I thought so then, and I think so now. But if we neglected our duty last summer we should not plead our own neglect as an excuse for an act of injustice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill which the House has under consideration today, H. R. 9827, in over-all is a disappointment to me because it will not raise as much revenue as I would like to see raised. But since it is a question of getting at some excess-profits taxes or failing to get at any, I had to compromise in the committee on many of the provisions. As we all realize, additional revenue will have to be raised in the immediate future from normal and surtaxes on corporations.

The most vocal opposition to an excess-profits-tax bill in any form before our committee was voiced primarily by big corporations. The smaller businesses admitted in general that an excess-profits-tax law should be enacted, and offered many constructive suggestions as to how such a law should be drafted.

I would like to have seen at least $5,000,000,000 or more raised by this bill. It could have been done very easily, and corporations would have been able to pay this $5,000,000,000 in additional taxes and still have more left after taxes than they did last year. Corporation profits after taxes in the second quarter of 1950 were at an annual rate of $22,000,000,000. For the year 1949, corporations' profits, after taxes, were $17,000,000,000. Within the last few months, corporation profits have risen 51 percent.

We must all remember that the period since World War II has been a period of unusual business prosperity throughout the country due to built-up demands, accumulated savings during World War II, and large postwar defense expenditures. This is directly a result of World War II, and is adequate justification for not allowing 100 percent of the base-period years, 1946–49, as normal earnings. We certainly should have used 75 percent of this base period rather than the 85 percent which is contained in the bill.

This bill is much more equitable and liberal than the World War II excess-profits-tax law. Many of the complaints which were levied at the World War II law and suggestions which were made as to how the new law should be written have been taken care of in this bill.

I would like to put the House on notice now that I will not vote for a repeal of this law when conditions are again normal until wartime excise taxes have been repealed.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MILLS, having assumed the chair, Mr. WALTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JENSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial by Constantine Brown.

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in four instances, in each case to include extraneous matter.

Mr. GARMATZ (at the request of Mr. BYRNE of New York) was given permission to extend his remarks.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN SHOULD RESIGN OR BE IMPEACHED—CONGRESS SHOULD DEMAND THE SPEEDY REMOVAL OF DEAN ACHESON

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, did President Truman know he was declaring war on Communist Red China when he ordered our Armed Forces against North Korea without the consent or approval of Congress?

If President Truman did know that he was declaring war on Communist Red China when he ordered our Armed Forces into action against North Korea last June, without the consent or approval of the Congress, he should be impeached for treason because he has aided the enemy by exposing our unprepared Armed Forces to death, destruction, and possible defeat because of the overwhelming odds against them.

If he did not know that he was declaring war on Communist Red China by attacking North Korea without the consent or approval of Congress, he should in the interest of national security and the public welfare of the Nation resign from the office of President because of his ignorance of the real situation in Korea and China last June.

How much longer must the people of this Nation be the victims of his incompetence, bungling, and bad judgment? Last June he said the Korean affair was just police action. Today it is the first phase of world war III.

Last August he said the Marine Corps were merely the police force of the Navy. The Marines have borne the brunt of most of the fighting on land in Korea which has cost us 8,000 killed, 30,000 casualties. By what stretch of anybody's imagination can this be called police action?

It is apparent that the North Koreans were assured of material and effective support from Communist Red China from the beginning of the Korean affair which Truman called a mere police action.

On Saturday, December 2, Gen. Douglas MacArthur made the following statement to the Associated Press in answer to several questions:

It is quite manifest now that from the beginning the decision was taken and as a part of the onslaught of the North Korean forces in their attack on June 25 that they were assured of such practical support as they are now receiving. The early successes of the North Korean invasion into South Korea obviated the necessity at that time of the open support which is now being furnished. As soon as the tide of battle began to turn, the Chinese war machine started to be geared for the Korean battlefront. Conjectures that had the United Nations modified its mission of liberating and unifying Korea and stopped its campaign at some incidental phase the entry of the Chinese Communists into the war could have been avoided find no support in actualities. The momentous nature of the decisions and actions which have been taken clearly show them to be basic in design rather than of superficial impulse.

What is the strength of enemy forces?

The immediate Chinese forces engaged comprise approximately 500,000 men divided into two great echelons. The front echelon now engaged in attack upon our forces comprises something more than one-half of this force, with the rear echelon rapidly moving up from the Yalu River bases. In the Yalu River sector also are the remnant North Korean forces now being rebuilt and reorganized under Chinese auspices amounting to an estimated 100,000 to 150,000 men. The total strength, therefore, which our forces face amounts to about 600,000 men. Whether additional forces will be brought up cannot as yet be determined.

How does this number compare with the allied nations' ground forces in Korea?

This overwhelmingly outnumbers our forces, the exact strength of which I would not care to give.

Is the enemy well equipped?

His forces are thoroughly equipped with modern and efficient weapons. Man for man our fire power is probably slightly greater than his, but this is compensated for by his simpler and less complicated organization which puts a greater number relatively in the combat echelon. His is a modern ground force in every sense of the term and capable of comparison with that of any other nation.

To what do you attribute our recent reverses?

They are due entirely to the overwhelming strength of the enemy, who completely outnumbers us on the ground.

What do you expect to happen in Korea?

I should not care to make any speculation as to the future.

The people in all parts of the Nation are angry and aroused. They feel the need of sound judgment, realistic thinking, and effective and protective action by the President and the State Department.

This is the first time in the history of the United States that we seem to have completely lost the initiative and seem to be subject to the whim and caprice of an unfriendly foreign power—Russia.

Never before in our history have leadership and wisdom in high places been so lacking, and the Government been rendered so impotent as it is in this critical period due to the mistakes of the administraton.

The Congress should demand the speedy removal of Dean Acheson as Secretary of State. Hs consistent mistakes and errors in judgment on our foreign relations especially his demand that our Armed Forces be removed from Korea before June 25 and his unfriendly attitude to Nationalist China and his statement that Korea was not defendable and his acceptance of Owen Lattimore's advice that Korea should be dropped by the United States but not to make it look as if we pushed her, all are reasons for his immediate removal.

Acheson was never capable of being Secretary of State.

Truman should never have been elected President.

Here are quotes from letters I have received demanding the removal of Acheson and the impeachment of Truman:

Truman should be impeached immediately. Acheson dismissed at once. A complete clean-up of State Department immediately.

Please use your influence for the sake of our beloved country in demanding the immediate removal of all traitorous people in the State Department and that includes Acheson.

It is time now for your action to throw Dean Acheson and his gang out.

As your constituents we strongly request that Dean Acheson be removed from the office of Secretary of State; the State Department be thoroughly cleaned, from top to bottom.

As an American citizen, I am demanding of our legislators the immediate impeachment of Dean Acheson and Harry S. Truman. Also an immediate removal of all pro-Communists from State Department.

Urgent Acheson be removed. Korean situation critical. Appeal to you for action.

If our President does not act at once and clean out that State Department it is time our Congress took things in hand. I hope you will do all in your power to see that the Reds from Secretary of State Acheson on down are cleaned out.

We are face to face with survival or destruction as a Nation. At this crucial hour we cannot afford the incompetent administration and the bungling poor judgment of Truman and Acheson. The people are demanding their removal from office for the Nation's security.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. VELDE asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes tomorrow, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

THE CRIMINAL PARTITION OF KOREA AND IRELAND

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, as of November 30, the total of announced American casualties in the Korean war mounted to 31,028.

This is the down payment for the blunders on our side, and the aggression of the other side.

With the North Koreans running interference, Russia carried war into the southern part of that Asiatic peninsula. We moved in to check aggression. Other nations supported us freely. The world trembled on the brink of disaster.

In view of our kid-glove diplomacy and lack of military preparedness, we had to face up to the issue before we were ready.

It might have happened at some other time and some other place, but the fact is that it did come to a head in a little-known country called Korea.

And the future may blame both the United States and Russia for the hasty and arbitrary division of that country into two parts at the close of World War II, because the friction produced therefrom helped to bring on world war III. Perhaps conciliation might have had a chance if it did not have to cope with the tensions bred by partition.

With the evils which flow from partition still teaching us in blood and agony that such compromise is bound to fail, we should resolve to end the partition of Ireland which also mocks the conscience of the civilized world.

It will rankle in the hearts of all Irishmen, and it will hurt Great Britain, until the day when the six counties of Ulster are reunited with the 26 counties of Eire to form that one and indivisible Ireland that was so designed by nature.

The sturdy faith and undying independence of the Irish, supported by millions of sympathizers in other lands, will not be satisfied with anything less than complete Irish sovereignty over the whole island.

The partition of Korea, like the quartering of Berlin deep in Soviet-held territory without providing for American-British-French control of the highway leading to their zones, these were improvisations that played directly into Soviet hands. How much these mistakes have cost us and how far the cost will climb before a solution is found for these problems is now a matter of world concern.

The partition of Ireland on the other hand was calculated to deny national integrity to a country whose right to be wholly free is rooted deep in history.

The reasons by which Britain seeks to justify the separation of the six northern counties from the motherland are not worthy of serious consideration. They never have, and never will work to Britain's advantage.

At this crisis in global affairs, when the free world is threatened by the power and subversive tactics of Red Russian imperialism, the unity of the Western world is weakened by Britain's stubborn refusal to return the six stolen counties to Ireland. It is one of the many factors that the Kremlin aggravates in order to stir up disunity among the Atlantic Pact nations.

At times the British Government is keenly sensitive to the public opinion regarding her actions that exists in other countries.

Above all, she should be guided to some extent by public opinion in the United States because of the generous assistance we have given to her—in war and in peace.

I do not bring up this matter to embarrass the British. I realize that we need each other, as we need the mutual support of all free nations in the fearful test looming up before us in which our very survival may hang in the balance.

If we would have the moral strength of justice on our side, then we must correct those wrongs in our society which feed ammunition to the propaganda machine of Red Russia.

There are tens of millions of Americans, those of Irish descent as well as many, many others, who resent Britain's insistence on the division of Ireland.

Every move made by British diplomats in the present world crisis is misunderstood. The worst interpretation is put upon British motives to the disadvantage of our common cause. Remembering the sell-out at Munich, and the long oppression and denial of legitimate Irish aspirations, too many of our people are building up suspicion and dislike of the British, and the resulting bitterness blinds Americans and British to the undivided effort needed against the real enemy—imperialist Russia.

There is even a belief that Britain backed out on its promise to give genuine and not pathetically token support to the gallant effort we made for the United Nations to halt the barefaced aggression in Korea that was directed by the Kremlin.

This is unfortunate.

It could be tragic.

Disillusioned by the heavy losses the United States has suffered in Korea because it was not given the full support of its paper allies, either on the military or the diplomatic fronts, the people of the United States might decide to go in alone.

That is exactly what Russia wants.

How, how can British diplomacy continue to make the blunders that serve such narrow ends? Have they forgotten Churchill's warning of too little and too late?

If the free world loses faith in Britain's integrity, then that nation dooms itself, and our battle for survival against the Russian appetite for conquest becomes more difficult.

Ireland is a small nation, but its claim is greater than that ever presented by any mother nation for the complete restoration of the land that belongs to its people by every moral, ethnic, economic, and historical right.

Britain must begin the hard road back to win the confidence of American public opinion which she has alienated.

The sell-out of Ireland and Korea must be redeemed.

What has happened to the Irish resolution in the House Foreign Affairs Committee?

Why is it not brought out into the open so that this Congress may go on record as urging Britain to atone for the crime of Irish partition and empowering the United States Government to assist the British in bringing about complete freedom for all Ireland?

There must be a united Korea and a united Ireland, in principle and in fact; both nations to be whole and independent.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, December 5, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

OATH OF OFFICE, MEMBERS AND DELEGATES

The oath of office required by the sixth article of the Constitution of the United States, and as provided by section 2 of the act of May 13, 1884 (23 Stat. 33), to be administered to Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives, the text of which is carried in section 1757 of title XIX of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and being as follows:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

has been subscribed to in person and filed in duplicate with the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the following Members of the Eighty-first Congress, pursuant to Public Law 412 of the Eightieth Congress, entitled "An act to amend section 30 of the Revised Statutes of the United States" (U. S. C., title 2, sec. 25), approved February 18, 1948:

MYRON GEORGE, Third District, Kansas.

WOODROW W. JONES, Eleventh District, North Carolina.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1761. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting recommendations for action in the present session to renew the program of vocational rehabilitation for disabled veterans which was in effect during and after World War II (H. Doc. No. 728); to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and ordered to be printed.

1762. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a proposed supplemental appropriation to pay claims for damages, audited claims, and judgments rendered against the United States, as provided by various laws, in the amount of $5,274,033.96, together with such amounts as may be necessary to pay indefinite interest and costs and to cover increases in rates of exchange as may be necessary to pay in foreign currency (H. Doc. No. 729); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

1763. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the Migratory Bird Conservation Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the act of Congress approved February 18, 1929 (45 Stat. 1222; U. S. C., title 16, sec. 715b); to the Committee on Agriculture.

1764. A letter from the Acting Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of Gorgas Memorial Institute of Tropical and Preventive Medicine, Inc., for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

1765. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of certain legislation passed by Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the Virgin Islands, first session, 1950, pursuant to section 16 of the Organic Act of the Virgin Islands of the United States, approved June 22, 1936; to the Committee on Public Lands.

1766. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a law enacted by the Tenth Guam Congress, in accordance with section 19 of Public Law No. 630, Eighty-first Congress; to the Committee on Public Lands.

1767. A letter from the Deputy Attorney General, transmitting a draft of a bill entitled "A bill to amend section 215 of title 18, United States Code, to prohibit officers or employees of the United States from accepting payments for appointment or retention of a person in office or employment under the United States"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. McCORMACK:

H. R. 9840. A bill to exempt furlough travel of service personnel from the tax on transportation of persons; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PRICE:

H. R. 9841. A bill to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. LANE:

H. R. 9842. A bill to amend Public Law No. 441, Eighty-first Congress, so as to provide for the annual proclamation of National Children's Dental Health Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HELLER:

H. Con. Res. 291. Concurrent resolution memorializing and requesting the General Assembly of the United Nations to enact a measure or measures to the end that aggression in any part of the world may effectively be resisted; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARRETT of Pennsylvania:

H. R. 9843. A bill for the relief of Ina Adams, nee de Silva; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BOLTON of Maryland:

H. R. 9844. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Ermonie Locatelli; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BYRNE of New York:

H. R. 9845. A bill for the relief of Capt. Marciano O. Garces; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

2402. By Mr. CANFIELD: Resolutions adopted by the New Jersey State Association of the Chiefs of Police at their last meeting, held November 2, 1950, that all regular members of the police departments of the State of New Jersey, now or hereafter subject to draft under selective service, be deferred; to the Committee on Armed Services.

2403. By Mr. GRAHAM: Petition of the Beaver County Council of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of Pennsylvania, urging a full-scale investigation of our whole foreign and defense program; to the Committee on Rules.

2404. By Mr. RICH: Petition of Newberry Lions Club, Williamsport, Pa., in opposition to any form of compulsory health insurance or any form of Federal bureaucratic control to the application of medical science and/or medical services to the people; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

2405. Also, petition of Welcome Wagon, Newcomers' Club, Williamsport, Pa., in opposition to any form of compulsory health insurance or any form of Federal bureaucratic control to the application of medical science and/or medical services to the people; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

2406. Also, petition of Montoursville Garden Club, Montoursville, Pa., in opposition to any form of compulsory health insurance or any form of Federal bureaucratic control to the application of medical science and/or medical services to the people; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who putteth down the mighty from their seat and exalteth the humble and the meek, Thy providence has led us to the very vestibule of destiny. Upon the President of the United States and his counselors, the Vice President and Members of the Congress, the leaders of our Armed Forces, and upon all trusted with authority on whose shoulders rest the heavy burdens and responsibilities for vital decisions so largely molding the future and, for weal or woe, affecting the lives of untold millions, we implore the wisdom which is from above. As in the name of the Lord our God we set up our banners, with closed ranks we march on toward stern and bitter days with the assurance that as we fight to make men free we march with Thee. In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, December 4, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted to submit routine and noncontroversial matters for the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PETITIONS

Petitions were laid before the Senate and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A telegram in the nature of a petition from Mario L. Bove, of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the abolition of the atomic bomb, and so forth; to the Committee on Armed Services.

A resolution adopted by the Municipal Government of Rio Piedras, P. R., condemning the recent attack on President Truman (with accompanying papers); ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 4220. A bill for the relief of Thomas W. Wrangham; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KILGORE:

S. 4221. A bill for the relief of Dr. Yau Shun Leung; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mrs. SMITH of Maine:

S. 4222. A bill for the relief of Helen J. Lumley; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. CAIN introduced Senate joint resolution 211, to amend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, with respect to resolutions of local governing bodies, which was ordered to lie on the table, and appears under a separate heading.)

INVESTIGATION OF CAUSE OF COLLISION ON LONG ISLAND RAILROAD

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference a resolution providing for an investigation of the cause of the collision on the Long Island Railroad on November 22, 1950, and I ask unanimous consent that an article appearing in a recent issue of the New York World-Telegram and Sun be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the article presented by the Senator from North Dakota will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The resolution (S. Res. 369) was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation for the purpose of ascertaining the cause or causes of the collision which occurred on the Long Island Railroad on November 22, 1950. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem desirable.

The article presented by Mr. LANGER is as follows:

[From the New York World-Telegram and Sun]

"HUMAN FAILURE" MAIN CAUSE

These facts emerged incontrovertible today as unchecked "human failure"—the words of Governor Dewey—was established beyond peradventure of a doubt as the main cause of Wednesday's shocking accident in Richmond Hill where a Babylon-bound express sped unheeding through a warning and a stop signal and virtually gutted the rear car of a stalled Hempstead-bound local.

The same human failure was the cause of the Rockville Centre collision last February 17, which killed 32 and injured more than 100.

The same human failure was the cause of another collision in Sunnyside yards last December 22, which killed two and injured six.

And the ghost of that same human failure flashes beyond the scenes of the accidents to the equally fallible members of the Federal and State regulatory bodies on whom the public relies to make the railroads toe the mark—the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State's five-man public service commission.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES: REPORT OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL—ADDRESS BY SENATOR SPARKMAN

[Mr. HILL asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address by Senator SPARKMAN, United States Delegate to the General Assembly of the United Nations, in Committee No. 2, on October 19, 1950, on the Economic Development of Underdeveloped Countries: Report of the Economic and Social Council, which appears in the Appendix.]

LAND REFORM AND FARM DEVELOPMENT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR SPARKMAN

[Mr. HILL asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Senator SPARKMAN before Committee No. 2 of the Assembly of the United Nations, regarding United States proposals for land reform and farm development, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE KOREAN WAR—ADDRESS BY HERBERT HOOVER

[Mr. WATKINS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on the Korean war by Hon. Herbert Hoover, broadcast over the radio on October 19, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

SESQUICENTENNIAL OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT OF INDIANA—ADDRESS BY ELMER DAVIS

[Mr. CAPEHART asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Elmer Davis on November 30, 1950, in the Library of Congress, on the occasion of the opening of the Library of Congress exhibition commemorating the sesquicentennial of the establishment of the Territorial government of Indiana, which appears in the Appendix.]

FEDERAL JUDGESHIPS—EDITORIAL FROM THE NEWARK (N. J.) EVENING NEWS

[Mr. HENDRICKSON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Federal Judgeships," published in the Newark Evening News of December 4, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA AND HAWAII—EDITORIAL FROM THE NEWARK (N. J.) EVENING NEWS

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, in the light of the present parliamentary situation, it might be well for all of the Members of the Senate to read carefully an editorial entitled "Filibuster Against Justice," published in the Saturday, December 2, issue of the Newark Evening News.

Because it sounds an appropriate challenge and is germane to highly important calendar business, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be incorporated in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FILIBUSTER AGAINST JUSTICE

Statehood for Alaska and Hawaii, which the House of Representatives approved last spring, is being blocked in the Senate because of a threatened filibuster of southern Democrats. The arguments for statehood are overwhelming. Yet southern Democrats oppose it on the crass ground that four Senators might be added to present membership, who would favor antidiscrimination legislation.

The southern Democrats, as usual, are not alone. Republicans have joined them using the argument that the population of Alaska is too small to warrant sending two Senators and at least one Representative to Washington. The ranking Republican on the Senate Interior Committee, which has the statehood bill in charge, Senator BUTLER, of Nebraska, opposes statehood for Alaska on the ground that the bill is an administration attempt to bring two left-wing Democratic Senators to the Congress to offset the effects of the November 7 general election, which reduced the Democratic margin of control to two seats.

Alaska and Hawaii are defense outposts of first importance in the Pacific. To extend statehood, which means representation, to these territories is in the national interest. If the Senate Republicans tie up with southern Democrats on this issue, their criticism of administration foreign policies will to a large extent be stultified and a record written for their Presidential candidate in 1952 that will not bear examination.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF EDWARD P. MURPHY TO BE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, and in accordance with the rules of the committee, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Tuesday, December 12, 1950, at 10:30 a. m., in room 424, Senate Office Building, upon the nomination of Edward P. Murphy, of California, to be United States district judge for the northern district of California to fill a new position. At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the nomination may make such representations as may be pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], chairman, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER].

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF OLIVER J. CARTER TO BE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, and in accordance with the rules of the committee, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Tuesday, December 12, 1950, at 10:30 a. m., in room 424, Senate Office Building, upon the nomination of Hon. Oliver J. Carter, of California, to be United States district judge for the northern district of California. Judge Carter is now serving under a recess appointment. At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the nomination may make such representations as may be pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], chairman, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER].

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF WILLIAM M. BYRNE TO BE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, and in accordance with the rules of the committee, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Tuesday, December 12, 1950, at 10:30 a. m., in room 424, Senate Office Building, upon the nomination of Hon. William M. Byrne, of California, to be United States district judge for the southern district of California. Judge Byrne is now serving under a recess appointment. At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the nomination may make such representations as may be pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], chairman, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER].

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, yesterday after the Senator from Illinois left the Chamber there was colloquy between the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] and other Senators with respect to a unanimous-consent agreement as to when the Senate should vote on the rent-control resolution.

Mr. MAYBANK rose.

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the rent-control resolution and any amendments thereto be taken at 1 o'clock on Thursday next, and that the time prior to the vote be divided between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] and the chairman of the committee; and, of course, that no amendments not germane shall be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I do not intend to object to the unanimous-consent request. However, I ask that the request be amended so that on any amendment which is presented there shall be opportunity for at least 5 minutes' debate on each side, so that we shall not be voting on amendments without knowing what is contained in them.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I will make the hour 2 o'clock, because I know that the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] has in mind a situation which the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] intends to discuss.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That still does not take care of the situation. Sufficient time is needed for debate. Six or seven amendments might be offered. I do not want the Senate to be placed in a position of voting on amendments without at least a brief explanation.

Mr. MAYBANK. I am glad to modify my unanimous-consent request accordingly.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska would have offered the suggestion made by the Senator from California if he had been on his feet and had been recognized. That is one of the standard requirements in connection with such a unanimous-consent request. I think it is a good suggestion.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. Just a moment. I question, however, if 5 minutes is sufficient time. We have had a great deal of difficulty with allowing only 5 minutes' debate. I do not know that there will be need for any time. I do not know whether any further amendments will be offered.

Mr. MAYBANK. I know of none except the so-called California amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. I wonder if the distinguished Senator will amend his request so that the time on each side will be not more than 10 minutes. Then no one can complain.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion.

Mr. WHERRY. And the hour is 2 o'clock?

Mr. MAYBANK. Two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina as modified?

Mr. WHERRY. As I understand, the time between 12 and 2 is to be equally divided.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. An hour for each side.

Mr. MAYBANK. There would not be an hour for each side if there should be a quorum call. However, whatever time there is is to be equally divided, and controlled by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] and the chairman of the committee. I suggest the Senator from Ohio because he is a member of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement was subsequently reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That on the calendar day of Thursday, December 7, 1950, at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, under the limitation of debate hereinafter provided, upon any amendment or motion (including appeals) that may be pending or that may thereafter be proposed to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and upon the final passage of the said joint resolution: Provided, (1) That after said hour of 2 o'clock p. m., debate upon any amendment or motion (including appeals) and upon the joint resolution itself, shall be limited to not exceeding 20 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the mover of any such amendment or motion and the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. MAYBANK; (2) that no amendment or motion that is not germane to the subject matter of the said joint resolution shall be received; and (3) that no vote on any amendment or motion (including appeals) proposed to the said joint resolution shall be had prior to the said hour of 2 o'clock on said day.

Ordered further, That on said day of Thursday, December 7, the time between 12 o'clock noon and 2 o'clock p. m., shall be equally divided between those favoring the joint resolution and those opposed thereto, and controlled, respectively, by Mr. MAYBANK and Mr. BRICKER.

ARREST OF WITNESSES WHOSE TESTIMONY IS REQUIRED BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE INTERSTATE CRIME

Mr. CAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I ask unanimous consent, without the Senator from Washington losing the floor, that the motion entered by me yesterday to reconsider the action on the vote to refer Senate Resolution No. 368 to the Committee on the Judiciary be acted upon at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have had occasion to look into this question overnight. This is too serious a matter to act upon at this particular time. I want it distinctly understood that I am not in any way attempting to obstruct the determination of the special committee ultimately to find out just where these crooks are. I undertake to say, as a result of what I have seen from examining the resolution and examining the authorities, that what is proposed is that the Senate arrest a man without any subpena ever being served upon him. That is exactly what is attempted, and not even upon a prima facie case. On the strength of the statement that a man cannot be found, it is proposed that the Senate proceed to arrest him. That is a serious question, and reluctantly I must object to the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I wonder if we could fix a time to act upon the motion. We have hearings scheduled, and it is necessary for us to make every effort to find these witnesses, in order to proceed with the hearings. Our hearings would be very incomplete, and our report to the Senate would be incomplete unless we had the benefit of their testimony. I am anxious to dispose of the motion one way or the other. I do not care to debate it. I think the statement in the RECORD yesterday should amply satisfy anyone as to the precedents in the matter.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, at the appropriate time I shall have something to say about the precedents. I do not think there is any precedent for what is attempted on the part of the committee headed by the Senator from Tennessee. If the Senator from Tennessee desires to follow the procedure which I think is absolutely essential, proper, and safe from the standpoint of the integrity and dignity of the Senate, as well as the precedents of the Senate, and if he will allow this subject to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with directions to report back within, say, 3 or 4 days, I shall be willing to abide by the decision of the Judiciary Committee on this question after the committee has studied it.

I say again, as I said yesterday, that in my judgment, before we go off on a wild-goose chase of this character, without any precedent whatever heretofore in the Senate of the United States for such action as is proposed, a standing committee, the Judiciary Committee in this case, which has the power to make a determination of this kind, should be called upon to act.

I merely make that statement, Mr. President. I myself desire to consider the question further.

I repeat, that I would abide by the action of the committee, if the Senator from Tennessee is agreeable to having the resolution go to the Judiciary Committee, with directions to the Judiciary Committee to report back within a reasonable length of time what it feels should be done. It is my understanding, however, that no one outside the committee has been consulted about the matter; not even the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate knew anything about what the resolution would compel him to do. Perhaps he should not have known anything about it. Perhaps it is not within the realm of the committee to confer with anyone on the subject. But certainly I, as majority leader, did not know anything about the matter until it was brought up on the floor of the Senate. I do not know of anyone else who knew anything about this very important resolution. So I still am constrained to object.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee or the Senator from Illinois, if he has the floor, yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] has the floor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Will the Senator from Washington yield so I may ask a question of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CAIN. If I may do so without losing the floor, I shall be glad to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I happened to be sitting temporarily in the chair of the minority leader yesterday when the Senator from Tennessee brought up the subject. Because of the character of the resolution it was particularly interesting to me. As I understand, if on the recommendation of the special committee the resolution is adopted, it will create a precedent in the Senate in that it will permit the Senate to order the Sergeant at Arms to arrest and bring before a special committee of the Senate a man who has not been found by the committee and has not been summoned. That case would be different from that of a man who had been summoned and either refused to testify or refused to come before the committee in answer to the subpena.

The request now made, as I see it, would stretch the situation very considerably. Let me give an illustration. Suppose, for instance, a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary had only sufficient money to employ two investigators, and they were endeavoring to bring a certain individual before the committee. As an illustration we will use my own name, because I do not want to bring in the name of anyone else. Suppose there were 10 Leverett Saltonstalls within the United States. Let us suppose the subcommittee did not have sufficient funds, or did not have time to send out men to find the Leverett Saltonstall it was desired to bring before the committee. Let us assume that a resolution of the kind in question were adopted, which would permit the Sergeant at Arms either to employ a great number of men—which he will not do—or try to obtain the help of the FBI in bringing the proper individual before the subcommittee. That would mean that possibly an innocent man, who may never have known that the Senate subcommittee wanted him, would suddenly find an FBI man in his house with a summons, who would shackle him to himself and bring him to Washington.

Mr. President, it seems to me a question of this nature should be gone into with a great deal of care. In my opinion, there is a way out of the situation if the Senator from Tennessee wants to use it. The resolution, as I see it, as it has been read to me and as I have read it casually, would permit the special committee of which the Senator from Tennessee is the chairman, to request the aid of the various departments of the Government.

If the members of the special committee feel that the FBI perhaps would not undertake to act on the order of the special committee alone, it seems to me the Senate in this case could very well adopt a Senate order requesting the FBI to assist the special committee to find the 10 persons who we are informed are not particularly desirable citizens. If the special committee wants that done, it seems to me it would be perfectly proper for the Senate to adopt such an order without further consideration by a full committee. But if the special committee contemplates having the Sergeant at Arms, through the FBI, summon before the committee citizens who may never have heard of the summons and may never have heard anything about what the special committee of the Senate is doing, then we will be taking a long step toward losing our civil rights, and away from protecting private individuals against seizure and against personal arrest.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The observation by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has gone very far afield, in its application to the facts in this particular case. In the first place there are ample precedents for what is sought by the resolution. The Senate on many, many occasions, which I cited yesterday—and the Cunningham case is directly in point—has ordered that witnesses be arrested and brought before a committee of the Senate to answer questions and give testimony. So there is no question about the precedents. As a matter of fact, it must be clear that the right to bring in a witness under circumstances of this kind is inherent in a Senate committee if it is going to function in an investigatory capacity at all. Such a right has been recognized and exercised ever since the origin of the Senate of the United States.

The second point is that the Senator from Massachusetts says such action might violate the civil rights of some one. The statement is containd in the report, and the members of the special committee certify to the statement, that every human means has been employed to try to find these particular witnesses. Subpenas have been issued requiring them to come before the special committee to testify. The press and the radio have been asked to publicize their names over the Nation and to try to secure for us information as to where the individuals in question are. We have had members of their families come before the committee in order to try to obtain information from them as to the whereabouts of the witnesses. So there is no possibility whatsoever that these persons do not know that they are wanted to appear before a Senate special committee. They have not been at their usual whereabouts, their homes, their places of business. They have secreted themselves so it is impossible to reach them by the ordinary process of the service of subpenas.

If a subpena is placed in the hands of an officer, which is the way such things are usually done, and that officer is in New York, whereas the witness the subcommittee is trying to find is traveling around in California, it is impossible to send the man with the subpena to the place where the witness is who is wanted. But after every effort has been made to endeavor to find the witness, if a warrant for his arrest is issued, that warrant can be given to a class of officers, that is to all the marshals or to the Secret Service, or certain law enforcement officers of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, so they can arrest, under the order of the Senate, the person required, and hold him for the Senate committee. Such an order of arrest can be issued to a certain class of law enforcement officers, officers who are located in all parts of the United States, and in the place where the witness can be found.

Mr. President, the matter resolves itself down to this: That the individuals in question are the key witnesses in a certain part—indeed, the main part—of the inquiry particularly involving wire service around which bookmaking operations take place. If the special committee is not to have the backing of the Senate so it may use the facilities and the enforcement division of the Department of Justice to enable it to try to secure these witnesses and bring them before the special committee to testify, then the order of the Senate to the special committee to make an investigation simply cannot be carried out.

Mr. President, what is now taking place is, in my opinion, a delaying tactic. The precedents are clear, it seems to me, for anyone who will read them. If the special committee is to continue with its investigation, I think it is necessary for it to have such action as it requests taken by the Senate rather than having a long discussion before the Committee on the Judiciary, with delays, and perhaps adjournment of Congress before action is taken. In such event the hearings which have been scheduled will have to be postponed.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield so I may ask one more question?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I shall not debate with the Senator from Tennessee about the Cunningham case because I should like to look into it more carefully. But will the Senator answer my question as to why it would not be practical to follow the suggestion I made with respect to the Senate adopting a specific order with relation to this specific case, supporting the special committee's position in requesting the FBI to seek the individuals in question, which is essentially what the Senator from Tennessee is trying to have done or wants to have done through the method he has proposed? Such an order would create no precedent and would place the full Senate support behind the special committee's request that the FBI help the special committee. Why would that not be a practical way of acting?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I will say to the distinguished Senator that if the FBI heard that a witness was, let us say, in Philadelphia, or in some other city, on a certain day, and if the marshal in that city did not have the power to arrest the individual and hold him until we could have a subpena served on him to bring him before the special committee, if the individual would simply go to some other city, we would be able to accomplish nothing in the end. Unless the enforcement officer has the power to hold a witness for the purpose of interrogation by the special committee, we would be able to accomplish nothing. I can tell the Senate, on my own word, that every human effort has been made to serve subpenas on the particular witnesses who are wanted and to ascertain their whereabouts.

I do not think there is any possibility of anyone confusing these particular witnesses with anyone else of the same name, because they are well described and they are very well known.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. I should like to know what the objection of the Senator from Tennessee is to the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Illinois that the resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to report to the Senate by Tuesday, let us say. I should like to know what the objection of the Senator from Tennessee is to that suggestion.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I have no objection to having the Judiciary Committee consider the resolution, except that anyone who reads the opinions must realize the inherent right of the Senate. It must be very clear to all of us who read the opinions that this power is one which the Senate has, and that the Senate has used.

The objection I have is to the delay which would be caused. We have hearings scheduled in various parts of the country where these witnesses are key figures. I would hate to see the hearings delayed 2 or 3 weeks, in order for the resolution to be referred and reported in the way suggested.

Mr. LUCAS and Mr. CHAVEZ addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield first to the majority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, following the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee, I wish to assure the Senate that this is not a delaying action. I have no more use for the crooks the Senator is trying to find than he has. He will find crooks throughout the United States; his committee will be functioning for a long time.

I noticed an article in the morning newspaper in regard to an incident which occurred in the Senator's section of the country, namely, in Mississippi, where someone held up some gamblers and took $25,000 or $50,000 away from them, and then escaped into Tennessee. It is obvious that it will be possible for this special committee to continue to function from now until virtually the end of time, because there always have been crooks, and undoubtedly there will continue to be for an indefinite time in the future.

So I am in favor of having the Senator and his special committee find out the crooks; but I am also somewhat disturbed about the method proposed to ascertain who the crooks are and where they are.

Mr. President, certainly there cannot be any harm in having a standing committee of the Senate, if you please—the Judiciary Committee has been suggested by the able Senator from North Dakota—look carefully into the precedents, to determine whether the Senate would be pursuing the proper course, under the resolution.

In the course of his remarks yesterday, the Senator from Tennessee cited the case of McGrain against Daugherty. I have had an opportunity to examine that case, overnight. In that case the witness was served with subpenas on two different occasions, but in each instance he failed to appear. The witness offered no excuse for either failure to appear. The general conduct on the part of the witness gave the Senate proper and substantial grounds to use its power of arrest to bring the witness before it.

In the case of Barry versus United States ex rel. Cunningham, which was also cited by the Senator from Tennessee, a set of facts different from those we now have before us was presented. In that case the witness had testified once before a Senate subcommittee, but had refused to answer certain inquiries bearing upon the investigation. That was in the Vare case. Again the Senate had sufficient and proper grounds to employ its power of arrest, for the witness had displayed a contemptuous attitude before a Senate subcommittee.

In other words, in both the cases cited, as I understand, the witnesses had appeared. In one case, the witness subsequently refused to answer; in the other case, the witness subsequently refused to appear before the committee. Under those circumstances, in each case the Senate ordered an arrest. I have only casually examined those two cases, Mr. President; and those are the two cases which are cited as precedents for the action now proposed.

I have consulted the Parliamentarian of the Senate, who has been our Parliamentarian for a long, long time. He advises me that there has been absolutely no precedent, so far as the Senate is concerned, for doing what is now proposed.

Under these circumstances, as the able Senator from Massachusetts has pointed out, simply because someone may be afraid for political reasons that something is going to happen to him if he does not look after these crooks in this particular way, surely we should realize that something most important is involved, namely, the question of whether the Senate is going to set a precedent of this kind. If the Judiciary Committee, a standing committee of the Senate, reports that the step proposed is the one which should be taken, and if all the precedents are in that direction, I will stand with the Judiciary Committee in connection with this matter.

However, in fairness to the Senate, I think this question should be argued carefully and should be looked into carefully by a standing committee, such as the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, I would even go along with the suggestion which has been made by the able Senator from Massachusetts. All that is asked for in reality is help from the FBI. Under this resolution it will be discretionary whether these agencies cooperate. However, with the full power of the Senate of the United States back of a resolution asking the FBI to cooperate with this special committee in ascertaining where these men are, certainly that would be all that would be necessary.

When the Senator from Tennessee says that if one of these men were found, they would not have a right to subpena him, let me say that if a FBI man finds one of these men, the Senator from Tennessee need not worry; before the FBI finds the man, the committee will have plenty of time to issue a subpena for him. The FBI does not work in any other way; if they find a man, a subpena for him to appear can be issued.

However, under the procedure here proposed, it would be possible in the future to arrest many an innocent man. That is a dangerous course to pursue, Mr. President. I continue to object.

Mr. LUCAS subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier today the Senate had under discussion the motion presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], and, as Senators know, it was finally agreed that the motion be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with direction that the committee report back to the Senate by Friday of this week at 12 o'clock.

I have a short statement, prepared to be used in connection with the argument, if one was to be made today upon the floor of the Senate. I have used a portion of it, but I think that perhaps for the benefit of the Committee on the Judiciary it might be well to place the full statement in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that following the last remarks I made today upon the question of the reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], this short statement be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LUCAS ON KEFAUVER RESOLUTION

The resolution which the Senator from Tennessee is insisting that the Senate approve—without any prior study by the Judiciary Committee—directs the Sergeant at Arms to apprehend and arrest certain persons which the Special Crime Committee itself has been unable to locate. In determining what course of action we should take, our major consideration cannot be limited to the question of whether or not the Senate has legal power to approve such a resolution. After long litigation in the courts, it might very well be determined that the Senate has such power.

Our foremost consideration must be this: does this proposed resolution raise important legal problems that deserve the thorough study of the Judiciary Committee? There is no doubt in my mind that it does. No one here would deny that it would be an extraordinary procedure for the Senate to issue warrants at random for the arrest of American citizens. In fact, such a course would very likely violate the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution which provides: "—no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause." In other words, no person can be arrested unless there are substantial grounds justifying his arrest.

Is it not probable that this resolution would raise serious questions under this amendment and also under the fifth amendment which guarantees to every person the right to due process of law? Let me make my position clear. These constitutional questions make it imperative that the Judiciary Committee study this resolution before the Senate as a whole acts upon it.

Supreme Court decisions were cited in yesterday's debate to prove that the Senate has the authority to place these witnesses under arrest. In the final analysis these cases may influence a court in upholding the power of the Senate. But the facts in each of the cases cited are sufficiently different from the case at hand that we could reasonably expect any witness arrested under the authority of this resolution to challenge its legality through a writ of habeas corpus.

In McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U. S. 135 (1926)), cited in yesterday's debate, the witness was served with subpoenas on two different occasions and failed to appear in each instance. The witness offered no excuse for either failure. The general conduct on the part of the witness gave the Senate proper and substantial grounds to use its power of arrest to bring the witness before it.

Barry v. Cunningham (279 U. S. 597 (1929)), another case cited in yesterday's debate, also presents a different set of facts from those we have before us here. In that case, the witness had testified before a Senate subcommittee but had refused to answer certain inquiries bearing upon that investigation. (The matter being investigated was the primary election expenditures of William S. Vare, Senator-elect from Pennsylvania.) Again the Senate had sufficient and proper grounds to employ its power of arrest. The witness had displayed a contemptuous attitude before a Senate subcommittee.

The statement in the Cunningham case to the effect that an arrest can be ordered although a subpena has not been previously served or disobeyed, must be confined in its meaning to the facts which the court had before it. In all other respects it is dicta. In that case, a subpena had at one time been served and the witness refused to give certain testimony. The court was not faced with the problem raised by this resolution which involves persons who have never at any time been brought under a committee's jurisdiction.

From these cases it could be argued that the power of the Senate to arrest a person turns upon the whole course of the person's general conduct in relation to the committee's investigation. As I pointed out earlier, our courts might very well uphold the Senate's power, but it is also true that many of these persons may seek—and possibly obtain—writs of habeas corpus. They would argue that there is no constitutional basis for a warrant of arrest, that there is no course of conduct on their part to show that they would not have willingly responded to an ordinary subpena if one had been served.

It is not at all improbable that the approval of this resolution—rather than helping the Crime Committee—would in fact hinder it by involving it in extended litigation. This is one of the problems that should be considered by the Judiciary Committee.

Another question that should be considered by this committee is this: What is to be gained by the adoption of this resolution? The special Crime Committee is requesting the Senate to arrest these witnesses because it has been unable itself to locate them in order to serve subpenas. It would not seem very likely that the sergeant-at-arms would be able to locate these witnesses to arrest them any easier than the subcommittee could locate them to serve them with subpenas.

Either course of action would have identical results. If they are served with subpenas and fail to appear, they can be apprehended and punished by a year's imprisonment under section 192 of the general and permanent laws of the United States Senate. If these witnesses would refuse to appear in response to a subpena, they would by all probabilities refuse to testify if they were arrested by the sergeant-at-arms and brought before the subcommittee.

In this case they would also be punished under section 192 by imprisonment for as long as a year.

In short, the special Crime Committee, proceeding under its own powers, without the aid of the sergeant-at-arms, may very well attain every bit as much as it would accomplish by this resolution. Finding the witness would present the same problems; the willingness of the witness to testify would be the same, and the punishment of an uncooperative witness would be the same.

To summarize: This resolution should by all means remain with the Judiciary Committee where a thorough consideration can be given to the many questions which it raises. The Judiciary Committee can take into consideration the constitutional issues involved. It can consider the effects which protracted litigation, likely to arise under this resolution, would have upon the proper operation of the Crime Committee. It can consider also whether anything is to be gained by the adoption of a course of action which by all general appearances will attain nothing more than can be attained under the existing powers of the Crime Committee.

The Judiciary Committee, in studying this resolution, can also determine whether or not its approval would impair the prestige and influence of the Crime Committee by serving as an admission that it is unable to subpena its witnesses and punish them if they fail to appear. These problems are grave enough to justify the considered action of the Judiciary Committee, and they are serious enough to dissuade the Senate from a snap judgment on a matter of great importance.

It should be remembered that the Parliamentarian who has been here many years advises there is no precedent for such a resolution. Mr. President, I want the witnesses to appear. They should do so without attempting any extraordinary procedure—but the mere fact they are presumably evading service presents a serious question whether they can be arrested by the Sergeant at Arms before any summons has been served upon them.

Mr. President, I submit again that I shall abide by the decision of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CAIN. Yes; if I may do so, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I thank the Senator from Washington.

Mr. President, I think the difficulty is that the Senate does not realize exactly what power it has. Now we are begging for mercy, so to speak, in regard to what should be done in this connection.

I agree with the Senator from Tennessee that these persons should be brought before the committee. The Senator from Tennessee speaks about enforcement agencies. After all, Mr. President, the Senate has en enforcement officer, namely, its Sergeant at Arms. So what is the trouble? Why should the FBI be authorized to arrest someone, when the Senate of the United States itself simply has to order its enforcement officer to arrest the persons referred to? I assure the Senator from Tennessee that that procedure is sufficient. If the Senator from Tennessee himself does not answer a quorum call the second time, and if a quorum is not developed, if another Senator moves that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to bring in the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from Tennessee will be brought in.

I think the Senate has full power; but now we are begging, for some reason or other, to have some other enforcement power applied.

What has the Senator from Tennessee asked of our enforcement officer, our Sergeant at Arms, who has been constitutionally selected?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is what the resolution asks, namely, that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to proceed in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, under the circumstances I should like to have unanimous consent to continue to yield until the question now at issue has been resolved to the satisfaction of the Senators concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico that the resolution requests that the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be ordered to issue warrants for the arrest of these particular persons.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is the point I am trying to make. If the Sergeant at Arms, under the authority of a motion, has the right to bring the Senator from Tennessee to the floor of the Senate, why does not the Sergeant at Arms, under a resolution adopted by the Senate, have the right to execute the order of a committee?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is what I have been asking for. I appreciate the contribution made by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I think all this procedure is foolish, and we are losing time. I believe that all that the Senator from Tennessee and his special committee or any other committee has to do is to order the Sergeant at Arms, the enforcement officer for the orders of the Senate, to bring them in.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Will the Senator agree that has to be done by means of a resolution?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not think so. My good friend who now is presiding over the Senate, the distinguished President pro tempore, was brought into the Chamber on one occasion, contrary to what I thought was correct; but, nevertheless, he was brought in. Does the Senator from Tennessee mean to tell me that if the President pro tempore can be brought into the Senate Chamber, the Sergeant at Arms cannot bring before the Senate a little 2-by-4 crook who has been getting away with something?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Of course, the Senator is entirely correct. That is the point I have been trying to present; but the majority leader makes objection to it.

In the Cunningham case, which has been referred to, where a witness was wanted in connection with a Pennsylvania election, the subpena on the witness had expired, and the resolution was to cite him for contempt because he had previously refused to testify. However, the Senate of its own motion disregarded the contempt charge, and ordered the issuance of a warrant to arrest him and bring him before the bar of the Senate. On a writ of habeas corpus to question the constitutionality of that procedure, the court unanimously held that, of course, the Senate has a right to issue an order to its own Sergeant at Arms to arrest anyone it wishes to question.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not wish to go into a nice legal question. I think the Senate can now order its Sergeant at Arms to bring these persons before the Senate.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is exactly what we want to have done.

Mr. CHAVEZ. What has the committee done about that? Has the committee ordered the Sergeant at Arms to do so, under the authority it has to investigate?

Mr. KEFAUVER. We have filed a resolution asking that the Sergeant at Arms be ordered to bring them in.

Mr. CHAVEZ. But why is it necessary that the Senate now adopt a resolution of that sort, when constitutionally the Senate has appointed a Sergeant at Arms to carry out its orders?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, if there is objection to bringing the matter before the entire membership of the Senate, for the purpose of receiving the necessary authority, then certainly there would be strenuous objection made if the committee itself were to request the Sergeant at Arms to proceed. We therefore thought we were doing the proper thing in bringing the issue before the Senate and asking the Senate to assist the special committee by directing the Sergeant at Arms to arrest the persons named in the resolution and to bring them before the committee.

Mr. CHAVEZ. It is my opinion, though I shall leave the matter to the decision of the Parliamentarian and others who may wish to look into the legal aspects, that if any duly authorized committee of the Senate has authority to do something, and if things which the committee orders done are not done, the committee, without a resolution, may give appropriate orders to the Sergeant at Arms. I should like to inquire whether the Senator from Tennessee has taken this matter up with the Sergeant at Arms, and whether he has said to him, "Bring those bums in"?

Mr. KEFAUVER. We have presented the matter to the Senate through a resolution.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The Senator from Washington has the floor, and he will proceed.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield for a question to be addressed by me to the majority leader?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield for that purpose?

Mr. CAIN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for that purpose if I may do so without losing the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington yields to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the majority leader join in a request that the Committee on the Judiciary report back to the Senate on this matter by Friday? We are very anxious to have the question determined one way or the other.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. It is my understanding that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will return to the capital tomorrow, Wednesday. I should therefore think that Friday would be satisfactory, and I would not want it made later than next Monday. Other members of the Judiciary Committee are present, and I should like to have a statement or statements from them.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CAIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I think Friday would be agreeable. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee is not present. Does the Senator from Mississippi think that would allow sufficient time?

Mr. EASTLAND. I think Tuesday would be better.

Mr. LUCAS. Perhaps we can make it Monday.

Mr. EASTLAND. I suggest Tuesday. The committee generally meets on Monday.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The witnesses named in the resolution are needed for the hearings to be conducted next week.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Tennessee speaks of getting the witnesses for hearings to be conducted next week, I recall that his statement that he has used every means at his command, through the investigators on the staff of the committee, to try to find these witnesses, and that he has been unable to locate them. As I recall, he stated yesterday that one or two of them were, I think he said, in Mexico. I do not believe the Federal Bureau of Investigation will be able to get its hands on these people immediately. Certainly the Senator from Tennessee is going to be around here a long time, and apparently, the special committee is going to be functioning a long time. I feel sure the special committee will be unable to get its work done by the FBI. The committee will be asking the Senate for additional funds, which will be granted by the Senate at appropriate times, and the committee should do the work. When the committee makes a request, along about February 1, for perhaps $300,000 or $400,000, in order to really get the job done, I am sure the request will be granted. But I am still standing by what I said.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. After the majority leader has concluded his present observation, I shall be pleased to yield to the minority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if satisfactory to the Senator from Mississippi, who is a member of the Judiciary Committee, as it apparently is satisfactory to other Members, who have made no objection to it, it will be perfectly satisfactory to the majority leader to have the resolution which is now before the Judiciary Committee reported back, one way or other, by Friday of this week. That would be perfectly satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska object?

Mr. WHERRY. I want to say I think that would be a very happy solution of this problem. I felt we should comply with the request of the Senator from Tennessee, and that we should require the Judiciary Committee to report its finding, together with whatever recommendations it may deem proper, by Friday of this week.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the majority leader, in his unanimous-consent request, ask that this be a privileged report, so that we may get final action on the floor of the Senate? I presume it is privileged, anyway.

Mr. LUCAS. That is entirely satisfactory so far as I am concerned. I shall cooperate in whatever the Judiciary Committee does in connection with the submission of its report on Friday. My only request is that the Judiciary Committee shall take a very good look at this procedure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, in partial keeping with what the minority leader has just said, the only happier suggestion I could think of at the moment would be that the Senator from Washington in due time be encouraged and permitted to proceed with his statement.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I shall raise no objection to the request made by the Senator from Tennessee. The following language of the resolution submitted by the special committee appeals to me:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate issue his warrants commanding the Sergeant at Arms or such persons as may be deputized by him to take into custody the bodies of: Anthony "Tony" Accardo (alias Joe Batters), Patrick James Burns, Murray Llewellyn Humphreys, Rocco Fischetti (alias Ralph Fisher), Charles Fischetti (alias Charles Fisher, Dr. Charles Fisher, Charles Brown, and Ralph Fields), Joseph Sica, Martin M. Hartman, Ben Marden, John Patton, Elmer (Bones) Remmer, Morris Rosen, wherever found, and to bring the said persons before the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce in Washington, D. C., then and there to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as to the said special committee shall propound.

I emphasize the words "wherever found." I am willing to wait until Friday, but I suggest that the sooner it is authorized, the better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Is the proviso that the report be made a privileged matter included in the unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that if the unanimous-consent request is granted, the motion to reconsider would be withdrawn.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I refer to the report of the Judiciary Committee. Is it to be considered a privileged matter when it is submitted on Friday?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have no objection to that, because I think that whatever the Judiciary Committee does, one way or other, will be followed by the Senate. It will not take very long to make a determination of it. I should have no objection to including that particular suggestion in the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it not necessary to include in the unanimous-consent request a provision which will determine what is to be done with the motion to reconsider?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, if and when the unanimous-consent request is agreed to, I shall withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn. Is there objection?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The report then, as I understand, will be considered to be privileged. Am I correct in that understanding?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that the report would be privileged.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska for a question?

Mr. CAIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to address my question to the distinguished majority leader. In view of the fact that we now have a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon the rent-control measure on Thursday at 2 o'clock, it seems likely that, if the debate on the bill follows the usual course, we shall complete it sometime before 2 o'clock Thursday. The distinguished majority leader recently listed several bills which he said might be taken up in the event of a lull in the work of the Senate. I have a list of those measures. Will the distinguished majority leader say at this time that if there is a lull he expects to take up any of these measures, and whether, if he does, he will move to take them up in the order in which they appear on the list? I desire this information in order that I may advise Members on this side of the aisle and make it possible for them to be on the floor if and when any one of those measures is taken up. Does the majority leader feel that he is now ready to say which of those bills he will take up in the event of a lull in the debate on the pending measure?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CAIN. I have formed the habit of yielding, so I see no point in not yielding to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator for his courtesy in having yielded to me.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, we are very much interested in Calendar Order No. 2265, the bill (H. R. 5967) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, to clarify the status of freight forwarders and their relationship with motor common carriers; and we are also interested in Calendar Order No. 2540, the bill (H. R. 483) to extend the time limit within which certain suits in admiralty may be brought against the United States. In fact, we are interested in all the bills contained on the list which was recently placed in the RECORD. I cannot tell exactly the order in which they will be called up, which will depend upon who is sponsoring a measure and whether he is available at the particular time when a lull occurs in the debate. But I have given notice that we shall take up all these bills, and any one of them is likely to be taken up.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the distinguished majority leader. I think that ought to be sufficient notice to all Members that any one of those bills may be brought up at any time.

Mr. LUCAS. Furthermore, I may say there will also be quorum calls before the bills are taken up.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator from Illinois, and I also desire to thank the Senator from Washington for his courtesy in yielding so many times.

Mr. CAIN. The minority leader could not be more welcome.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. CAIN. I send to the desk an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution No. 207, and I introduce a joint resolution, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment offered by Mr. CAIN to Senate Joint Resolution No. 207 was ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 211) to amend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, with respect to resolutions of local governing bodies, introduced by Mr. CAIN, was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the amendment and the joint resolution deal with the same subject and are identical in language.

My hope is to improve the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207). The amendment, if adopted, would make certain that a pending and great injustice will not be imposed on millions of Americans.

I shall, however, vote against the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) even though my amendment is adopted by the Senate. My own considered view is that no reasonable need exists to require the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 207. Federal rent controls will not expire on December 31, 1950, as some Senators seem to think. Every city in America which is now under Federal rent controls can extend those controls for the first 6 months of 1951, if that is its wish. There will be ample time and opportunity for the new Congress to consider the need of further Federal rent controls. In my opinion, the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 207 will serve no useful purpose of any kind, character, or description. It would do much more harm than good. The Senator from Washington is against Senate Joint Resolution 207 in any form.

Should my view prevail, and Senate Joint Resolution 207 be defeated, the Senate then ought to pass the joint resolution I have just introduced. I think that both the amendment and the joint resolution will be approved without a dissenting vote.

Every Senator has an interest in the amendment and in the resolution. Let me attempt to arouse the curiosity of the Senate and define its interest by reading some testimony which appears on pages 22 and 23 of the hearing on Senate Joint Resolution 207 before the Committee on Banking and Currency on November 29, 1950.

The question before the committee was the extension of rent control. The first witness who appeared was Mr. Tighe E. Woods by name, and officially the Housing Expediter. Mr. Woods said:

A recent appellate court decision has cast serious doubt upon the validity of resolutions for continued control already passed by some 800 various municipalities. In defining the term "resolution," the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, in an opinion dated November 24, 1950, involving a decontrol resolution of the city of Los Angeles, stated:

"Congress intended that the resolution described in this statute be a legislative act."

It was further stated that the resolution for decontrol "requires the exercise of legislative power by the governing body of a city."

The court made clear that a simple fact-finding or administrative resolution is not sufficient. The municipalities' actions are legislative and must be clothed with all the requirements for passage of an ordinance. In fact, the court stated that the use of the word "resolution" instead of "ordinance" in the Federal statute is of no importance. In view of the similarity of language in the "continued control" and "decontrol" sections of the act, the question arises whether the communities are not required to act by a legislative process in order to preserve rent control after December 31.

The CHAIRMAN—

The chairman of the committee is the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK]—

The CHAIRMAN. What is that again?

Mr. WOODS. This is new and very serious.

Senator CAPEHART. As a member of the committee that passed that bill, you can tell that judge he did not know what he was talking about, as far as my mind was concerned.

Mr. WOODS. My mind, too, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true, because the congressional debate will clearly show that. As I remember, and it has been a long time ago, we did not go into the connotation of "ordinance" or "resolution," but we went into the question of governing bodies and what laws may govern them, because in some sections cities act by resolutions and in other places they act by ordinances, as I remember. Am I wrong?

I cannot figure that one out now.

Mr. WOODS. We cannot, either.

The CHAIRMAN. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD might throw some light on this point.

Mr. WOODS. We have every reason to believe that the vast majority of the local governing bodies construed the act, as did this agency, to permit them to take action continuing control by simple resolution, as distinguished from legislative acts attended with the formalities of ordinances. These formalities vary from city to city, depending upon the language of the particular charter, but they generally provide for notice by publication and lapse of a prescribed period of time after notice before becoming effective to permit referendum action, and so on.

While we cannot state that the view of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia will be followed by other courts, still we cannot escape the fact that this decision, being the only court of appeals decision on the subject to date, raises serious question as to the validity of all resolutions, both for continued control and for decontrol.

Mr. President, all that Mr. Woods, the Housing Expediter, and the several Senators have said in that testimony, as I understand, is that if the recent circuit court of appeals decision is upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States—and my understanding is that the question is now before the Supreme Court—800 affirmative actions by resolution taken by 800 American communities to extend rent control within their several jurisdictions from December 31, 1950, until June 30, 1951, will be invalid. Mr. President, they will be null and void.

It likewise follows that if the circuit court of appeals decision is upheld by the Supreme Court the hundreds of affirmative resolutions adopted by city councils throughout the country to decontrol their communities, as was the intention of Congress and the President of the United States, through the passage of the Rent and Housing Act of 1950, will be invalid. Such resolutions will become null and void.

It is for that reason I think every Senator, every Member of the House of Representatives, and every American has a real interest in the pending amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 207.

On July 14, 1950, the city council of the city of Los Angeles published a notice advising the general public that in accordance with section 204 (j) (3) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 as amended, the city council would hold a public hearing on July 28, 1950, to determine whether or not there existed such a shortage in rental housing accommodations in the city of Los Angeles as to require the continuance of Federal rent control in that city. On July 28, 1950, the city council held the public hearing in accordance with the previously mentioned notice. On the same day the city council adopted a resolution in which the council stated that, as a result of the public hearing held on that day it found that there no longer exists such a shortage in rental housing accommodations as to require rent control in the city of Los Angeles. The resolution was forwarded to Tighe E. Woods, as Federal Housing Expediter, who received it on August 2, 1950.

Shortly after receiving the resolution the Housing Expediter announced he would terminate rent control. Thereupon a series of suits were instituted against the Housing Expediter to enjoin him from terminating Federal rent control in Los Angeles. The district court in Washington, D. C., the appellate court, and the Supreme Court, and the municipal court in Washington, D. C., all denied the sought-for injunction.

Thereupon the Expediter, Mr. Tighe Woods, wrote the Los Angeles city council, stating he would not honor the resolution and remove controls from Los Angeles on the ground that the required finding of fact made by the city council as to the availability of rental housing accommodations in the city could not in his opinion be reasonably said to flow from the evidence adduced at the public hearing held by the city council prior to adoption of the resolution.

Upon the Housing Expediter's announced refusal to terminate rent control in Los Angeles—in my opinion to evade the law of the land as written by Congress and signed by the President of the United States—a suit was instituted against Woods in the district court in Washington, D. C., by a Los Angeles taxpayer, seeking a mandatory injunction which would compel the Housing Expediter to terminate rent control in Los Angeles in accordance with its city council's resolution, and, parenthetically, in keeping with the law of the land. The district court granted the mandatory injunction, and an appeal was taken to the circuit court of appeals. That court reversed the judgment of the district court and ordered the complaint dismissed on the ground that the Los Angeles city council should have made its finding of fact in the form of an ordinance rather than in the form of a resolution, holding that the language "resolution" in the Housing and Rent Act is not controlling but that the city council is exercising a legislative power which must be exercised by ordinance.

An appeal from the circuit court decision has been taken to the Supreme Court. Should the decision of the circuit court be sustained, the validity of action already taken by local governing bodies in continuing or terminating Federal rent control in an estimated 1,000 cities throughout the Nation, which have either terminated such controls or continued them until June 30, 1951, by resolution of their governing bodies adopted for that purpose pursuant to section 204 (j) (3) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 as amended is endangered.

We are informed that the Housing Expediter has never rejected any of the more than 1,000 resolutions received by him on the ground that they were legislative acts and should be in the form of ordinances and he did not reject the Los Angeles resolution on the ground that it was not in the form of an ordinance. That is pointed out very clearly in the hearings to which I recently made reference. He did not reject the Los Angeles resolution on the ground that it was in the form of a resolution rather than in the form of an ordinance.

Under the decision of the court of appeals the continuation or termination of Federal rent control by local governing bodies pursuant to section 204 (j) (3) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 as amended, is held to be an exercise of legislative power. Hence if the decision is correct it follows that the action of hundreds of local governing bodies in continuing or terminating Federal rent control by resolution is illegal and void, the result of which is to leave the status of rent control in these cities in doubt and confusion and render chaotic—I can think of no other properly descriptive term—the legal relations between hundreds of thousands of landlords and tenants in these areas. Also, the cities which have not acted in many instances do not have time to comply with the formal requirements for adoption of an ordinance but can adopt resolutions as the latter are not usually surrounded by such formal requirements.

I notice that the distinguished senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] has an interest in this question. I should like to ask him how many people he thinks would be involved if the present decision of the circuit court of appeals were to be upheld by the Supreme Court? Forty million people, property owners and tenants, would be left in doubt.

For these reasons the junior Senator from Washington—and I feel that we may take it for granted that such action has the approval of every other Senator—submits the amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 207 and urges its adoption. I hope it will be adopted on Thursday of this week. Without the amendment, and if the decision of the appellate court is sustained, property owners and tenants in every area of the country previously decontrolled by local governing body resolutions, as well as those communities who by appropriate resolutions have requested additional control, will find themselves in a most distressing position, which the Congress, in designing the statute, had never intended.

Mr. President, in conclusion I can say only what everyone is aware of, that as a result of considered argument and debate the Congress and the President thought it perfectly proper to provide the cities of this country with the authority, by any legal means within their power, either to decontrol themselves or to continue Federal rent controls for 6 months, beginning on the 1st day of January, 1951. It was never the intention of a single Senator, to my knowledge, to do other than provide some semblance of sovereignty, home rule, and home responsibility to the communities of America. The circuit court of appeals—and, necessarily, as a lay person I do not criticize that action—has by its decision said that the Congress had no such intention, and that the Congress only wanted to permit cities to decontrol themselves or to continue controls by means of city ordinances.

Mr. President, I hope that the question will be satisfactorily taken care of on Thursday, and that my amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 207 will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I was not quite clear as to the language of the Senator's amendment which, as I understand, is designed to clarify this confusion.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I think that is an important question.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I do not know whether the language is in the RECORD or not. I should like to have the answer.

Mr. CAIN. The answer is that the words of the amendment to the resolution would merely validate all the actions which have been taken by cities either to decontrol themselves or to continue controls for an additional 6 months.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Irrespective of whether the action was in the form of an ordinance or resolution, or what have you?

Mr. CAIN. If the Senator will bear with me, I shall read that part of the amendment which deals with the question:

Provided further, That as used in this act the term "resolution" shall not be construed to be limited to ordinances or other legislative acts, and any resolution heretofore adopted by any local governing body is hereby declared to be effective for the purpose of this section 204 (j) (3) or section 204 (f) (1), whether or not such resolution was legislative in character; and no suit or action shall be brought under section 205 of this act, or any other provision of law, on the basis of any administrative decision or the decision of any court that the resolution described in this act must be a legislative act.

THE WAR IN KOREA

Mr. EASTLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the agreement made by the Senate yesterday, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Mississippi. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I am sorry, but I must shortly leave the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized pursuant to an agreement made yesterday.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I have been trying to obtain the floor since yesterday afternoon to discuss the matter before the Senate. I shall require considerable time. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, General MacArthur is one of the world's great military leaders, and in my judgment his planning, direction, and conduct of the Korean campaign has been outstanding, against odds, and against unusual conditions which have never before confronted a military commander.

The principal cause of the Korean difficulties is American inadequacies. General MacArthur has had an inadequate number of men, inadequate equipment, and inadequate supplies. There has been too little of everything to perform against every eventuality the mission which was entrusted to him. The fact that he has had too few men, too few weapons, and too little equipment to meet any eventuality, is not his fault. The blame rests upon the shoulders of other people.

Mr. President, it is heartbreaking to see this proud and glorious Nation brought to the sad fix in which we find ourselves today. The difficulties in Korea are not the fault of the American people. They are brought about by the policies of our Government. They are caused by those who preached the Lattimore line—that the Chinese Communists were not Communists but agrarian reformers; that they were not lined up with Moscow; that Chiang Kai-shek was a rascal and a knave; and that we could not afford to dirty our hands with him. This was the prevailing opinion of this Government, and I am frank to say that I think some who preached this line in the Government were Communists, and others were duped by Communists.

It is my judgment that the China policy of the State Department, which dates back several years, is responsible for our sad plight in Korea, and for America's weakened position in the Orient.

Mr. President, it is my judgment that some who preached this line and who followed this policy today occupy honored positions in this Government, and the first thing that must be done is to permit them to resign from the public service. It gains us nothing to win a war by armed might and then lose the victory on the diplomatic front.

The Prime Minister of Great Britain is in Washington upon a mission which, if his purposes are correctly described in the press, would constitute a Munich which would dwarf into insignificance the agreement between Chamberlain and Hitler at Munich in 1938. It would check off the vast resources of Asia to communism, and would tremendously weaken the United States throughout the world. In fact, if we lose Asia with its vast manpower and resources, the foundation is laid for Communist control of the world. The truth is that if the Communists are permitted to absorb and digest Asia, their conquest of Europe will be simple. The control of Asia will place them 75 percent of the distance on the road to world control for communism. I note that the British and French desire, among other things, to take Communist China into the United Nations, and want us to sacrifice Formosa.

Mr. President, to take Communist China into the United Nations would be like placing a rattlesnake in a playpen with little children, and would raise the crime of blackmail to one of the cardinal virtues of mankind. Communist China, in conjunction with the Soviet Union, is bent upon world conquest. We must recognize this fact and act before she becomes any stronger.

The hour of decision is now upon us, and all we do is talk. We must act at once. There must be general mobilization, and the country must be placed on a war footing. In addition, we must take several definite steps, with or without the assistance of the British.

To begin with, Mr. President, we must realize that Communist China is just as wanton an aggressor as the Soviet Union. She has attacked Tibet. She today murders American boys. She wages war in Indochina, and, in addition, she is building a tremendous army for conquest under the banner of world communism. I note in the press that she is at this time instituting universal military training.

It is the Russian program to use the Chinese millions to conquer the world. We cannot afford to permit this great Chinese army to be so used. We cannot permit the Communists to solidify and stabilize China. Instead, we must fight back. We are in reality at war with her now, and in this extreme emergency we are not doing everything we can do, should do, and must do. The cry is raised that we cannot afford to get boggged down in China and forego our commitments to humanity in Europe, but it would be tragic, Mr. President, if we let the counsel of despair or confusion force us to lose both Europe and Asia. This is the danger we confront, and the time has come for such realism as we have never shown before. If we are not to continue playing directly into the Kremlin's hands we must find a way to catch the Communists in the very traps they have laid for us.

Mr. President, we never intended to commit American troops to an endless ground warfare against the Communist hordes of the Orient. We knew that should Communist China move into Korea our whole military strategy would have to be revised. This is the chance that was taken. The Chinese Communists have moved; our whole military strategy in the Orient has to be revised, and the time to do it is now, without waiting for 62 different nations to submit 62 different interpretations of a new Munich by which to guide us. The American people must understand that with America's future hanging in the balance, with American boys pouring out their lives, with the American people financing with their earnings and savings the struggle to stop the spread of communism in Europe, the time has come for the American Government to stand on its own feet with a realization that it is our destiny with which we gamble.

Mr. President, the truth is that in spite of the staggering defeat we are now suffering in Korea the strength of the Communists' forces that are pitted against our boys has become their greatest weakness. Gen. Lin Piao, who is commanding the North Manchurian Chinese Communist Army, is the only warlord in Communist China, and has concentrated the whole strength of the Chinese Communist Army in Manchuria for this drive.

Likewise, Mr. President, the industrial backbone of the Chinese Communist military power lies in Manchuria, with the largest arsenal of the Orient located at Mukden. Here is the industrial potential, and here are the armed forces of the Chinese Communists now concentrated in Manuchuria in such a way as to provide a perfect opening for the launching of a second front on the Chinese mainland by Chiang's Nationalists troops now stationed in Formosa, supplemented by an American naval blockade of the coast of China and the American air power turned loose to destroy the transportation system of China and the industrial potential which is concentrated in Manchuria. If such a plan were undertaken now the guerrilla potential of southern China would join forces with Chiang and would march northward to balance off the Chinese Communist troops in Manchuria, thus catching them in the very trap they set for us.

Mr. President, I am solemnly convinced that such a plan constitutes the only realistic alternative either to abject surrender, complete withdrawal, or suicidal appeasement.

We must immediately clamp an iron blockade upon the China coast and seal her ports to all commerce with anyone. American air power must attack and destroy Chinese industrial potential and China's transportation system. In fact, she has no highways, but depends upon a thin spread of rail lines to supply her industries and feed and clothe her people. This transportation system can be destroyed by American air power from bases which we now possess. These two things, Mr. President, will do more damage than a great armed invasion of the China land mass. In addition, we must aid Chiang Kai-shek and assist him in returning to the mainland and destroying the Communists. We must aid and help the million anti-Communist guerrillas now in China and thus create havoc and confusion there.

Mr. President, I think it should be said here and now and frankly to the world that any appeasement which would take Chiang Kai-shek's army from the flank of China would be a catastrophe of incalculable proportions. Our European friends must realize that if Russia is permitted to arm China and train and equip an army of 50,000,000 men, Europe will be overrun. Our British friends must realize that American blood is being spilled, American boys are being savagely and brutally murdered, and that our country cannot let Hong Kong control our policies.

The world must realize that America in this hour is not helpless. We have the greatest fleet in the world, and the historical mission of any fleet is blockade. In this instance we have an adversary that is peculiarly vulnerable. With its teeming millions, its lack of self-sufficiency, and its lack of any place to go to attain sufficiency except from the sea, it is a peculiarly vulnerable target of blockade.

Mr. President, I cannot understand why this simple fundamental step has not already been taken. The Chinese Communist Government is at war with the United States, and I cannot understand why this simple fundamental step has not been taken. Moreover, we have millions of allies on the mainland of China, to say nothing of the highest trained army, eager and ready to go to the rescue, to rescue their homeland from a foreign enemy who has played cruelly with them and placed a foreign yoke upon them.

The policy under which our Nation can be brutally attacked by an unprincipled foe without fighting back must cease, and cease immediately.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, as follows:

Mr. WHERRY. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] are absent in attendance on the conference between President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee on board the Presidential yacht Williamsburg.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). A quorum is present.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I desire to speak very briefly in opposition to the proposed extension of the Rent Control Act. I think it is perfectly obvious that the pending joint resolution is no more than an attempt to nullify the action which was taken by the Congress last year. It is simply an effort to continue rent control for 2 months more, so that the next Congress may face the question again, and so that we may nullify the complete solution which we reached last year, and which I thought was, on the whole, a reasonable compromise.

In the first place, the Federal Government has no vested or constitutional power whatever to fix rents except as a part of the war power. That is the only possible justification for Federal interference in rent control. Under the Constitution of the United States it is entirely a subject for the States, a subject for the local communities. We got into it because of World War II. Under the war power we put in rent controls. Last year it was obvious that they were the very last of the war controls, and that the existence of a war 4 years before no longer justified, constitutionally or otherwise, the continuation of Federal interference in that field. The result was that we passed a law which was a fair compromise. We said, "Unless there is affirmative action by local communities to continue rent control, it will end on the 31st of December 1950." It was then provided that if the local communities asked to have rent control continued, it would remain in effect until the 1st of July, by which time Congress could again take action if it wished to do so, although it was intended that the whole program should then expire, the local communities and States having had plenty of time to continue it or to put into effect their own local controls, if they desired to continue rent control. This joint resolution is an effort to nullify that procedure.

An attempt is made to justify it on the theory that we now face another war, another emergency. Mr. President, if the Government decides that it should impose price control and wage control, then I think I should be perfectly willing to impose rent control. It seems to me it should be done without any vestige remaining over from the present control. Where control still exists it is in the case of a limited number of property owners and in the case of a limited number of homes. It is based on conditions which existed in 1941 or 1942. Prices in all other fields have responded to inflation, and have reached new levels. In this field alone control remains. Not only is it discriminatory against property owners, but it is discriminatory against a particular class of property owners, because there are only from eighteen to twenty million rental units available in the United States. As an inflation-control measure, it is today completely ineffective. As an inflation-control measure, it is shot through with exceptions. All new houses, for example, are completely exempt. All houses built in the past 5 or 6 years are therefore exempt. Many other houses have been exempted by local action. Of the total number of rental units available, 7,500,000 are under control.

All the present act provides is that if the council of a local community does not have sufficient interest to ask for a continuation of control, such control shall expire. This measure is completely repudiated. It is completely ineffective. It would simply restore a certain amount of benefits to a limited number of tenants under an act which imposed arbitrary and unjust controls and discriminated against a limited number of property owners.

If we are to go forward anew with rent control we should start from a new base. We should get rid of the old rent-control law. We should inaugurate control on a new basis. In my opinion, we ought to start on a better and more just basis than the Original Rent Control Act, which was passed during the Second World War. It seems to me obvious that if there is any justification for rent control we should let the old rent-control law expire. Then in the next session we should study the question of imposing new rent controls, or set up a new system, if war comes, or if we are going to impose price and other controls. In other words, if there is to be a general attack on the problem of inflation we ought to take the time to examine anew, and thoroughly, the whole problem of rent control, and enact a new rent-control law, just as today we are considering anew an excess-profits tax law by trying to eliminate the faults of the act which Congress passed during the Second World War.

If the present rent control law were permitted to expire, no one would suffer except a few persons in communities where sentiment is so strongly opposed to the continuation of rent control that the local authority refuses to ask the Federal Government to continue something which costs them nothing. Certainly if sentiment is so strong locally, there is no reason at all why people in the community should not have the right to determine the question for themselves.

Mr. President, this measure in no way deals with the general problem of inflation. It is not in the nature of an inflationary control measure at all from any national standpoint. Therefore it seems to me the measure should be rejected and the original operation, gradual decontrol under the old act, should remain in effect, as planned by Congress. Today conditions are no different than they were when the act was passed 6 months ago. We should let it expire. If the committee wishes to do so, it may consider what should be imposed if a new emergency should arise and if there is a national inflationary problem with which they propose to deal by methods of control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. It is my understanding that all Members of the Senate who desired to speak on the rent-control bill have now done so. There are some other bills which I have advised the Senate would be considered. Before moving their consideration I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answer to their names:

EXTENSION OF TIME LIMIT WITHIN WHICH CERTAIN SUITS IN ADMIRALTY MAY BE BROUGHT

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have advised the Senate that we would consider a number of bills if there was a lull in the proceedings. Apparently no Senators desire to debate the bill providing for extension of rent controls, with the exception of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], who a moment ago advised me that he wished to make some remarks on the bill; that he could not do so this afternoon, but could do so tomorrow.

There is on the calendar House bill 483, Calendar No. 2540, to extend the time limit within which certain suits in admiralty may be brought against the United States. That is one of the measures which I suggested on December 1 might be considered by the Senate at almost any time. I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 483.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 483) to extend the time limit within which certain suits in admiralty may be brought against the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am not going to object. Notice has been given by the majority leader several times that this bill, among others, might be brought up for consideration.

I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] if House bill 483 has had his attention, and whether there is any objection to considering it at this time.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill being considered at this time.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have no objection to granting the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 483) to extend the time limit within which certain suits in admiralty may be brought against the United States.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am ready for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I may briefly explain the purposes of the bill. It simply extends for another year, on behalf of certain litigants, particularly seamen who had brought suits in admiralty courts, tort actions with respect to Government-operated vessels, and who in their tort actions had named certain ship operators as operators of the Government-operated vessels. Some of them were under charter, and because of mistaken identity, many of the suits were dismissed.

The bill merely would allow the plaintiffs an extension of time in which to refile their suits against the proper operators and the proper defendants. It does not change the existing law whatsoever. It has nothing to do with the basic, permanent statute of limitations relating to the bringing of suits in admiralty courts.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. The extension is from what time?

Mr. MAGNUSON. From the time of the passage of the proposed legislation.

Mr. CORDON. When did the statute run as against these men?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that, as I recall the testimony, there were various times when the statute of limitations ran against them, but in most cases it was within the past two or two and a half years. Testimony was had on this matter last fall. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CORDON. Can the Senator from Washington advise the Members of the Senate as to when it was first known that there was a defect with respect to the parties defendant?

Mr. MAGNUSON. It became known when the Government brought action to dismiss the parties defendant on the ground that they were not the proper parties defendant. Some of the litigation had been pending for a considerable time, but the defect was found at the time the Government brought action to dismiss.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator from Washington know whether any amendments were offered to the bill in the committee? The bill before the Senate is reported without amendment. Some of us have an idea that an amendment was agreed to which I believe had something to do with interest.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That provision is included in the bill. That was voted into the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. That is in the bill now?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Does not the amendment differentiate between the type of cases brought in admiralty courts and courts generally?

Mr. MAGNUSON. No.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. The bill would allow interest from the time the suit was entered.

Mr. MAGNUSON. No. The bill provides:

Provided further, That after June 30, 1932, no interest shall be allowed on any claim prior to the time when suit on such claim is brought.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Is brought?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Is brought. In other words, if some of the claimants wish to bring the suit now, and, let us say, it remains in court for 6 or 7 months, the court could allow the claimants interest for that time. But no retroactive interest is allowed at all under the terms of the amendment placed in the bill by the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Do I understand the bill follows the usual practice in respect to all litigation in United States courts?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes; and does not change the basic admiralty law.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill (H. R. 483) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LUCAS. There is another bill which I should like to have taken up today; it is House bill 5967, Calendar No. 2265, a bill to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended. It is my understanding that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], who is interested in that bill, has left the city, and will not return until tomorrow. Consequently we cannot take up the bill until then.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Because of the importance of the so-called freight forwarders bill, the time element involved, and the necessity, in view of an Interstate Commerce Commission order, of taking some action on that bill, one way or another, at this session, I wonder whether we can make the bill the order of business, with the understanding that we may begin the debate on it tomorrow, when the Senator from Ohio has returned.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to see whether possibly we can dispose of another bill before doing that.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Very well.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to have the Senate take up the railway labor bill as soon as possible. It has been taken up by the Senate on several occasions, but on each and every occasion some parliamentary situation has resulted in postponing the consideration of the bill.

CITY OF CHESTER, ILL.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I now refer to House bill 2365, Calendar No. 1811, a bill for the relief of the city of Chester, Ill. I see that my colleague, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], is present. The other day I pleaded with my colleague, in view of the fact that both of us are lame ducks, at least to show a little mercy and a little tolerance about this particular bill, but he seemed as determined as ever. [Laughter.] In view of the fact that both of us are soon to go home, I thought perhaps we could go home very comfortably and happily together. However, for some cause or other, he would not yield. I am pleading with my Republican friends to go along with me on this bill. The Senator from Nebraska has been cooperating with me for years.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the truth.

Mr. LUCAS. He will not have much more time to show the deep and sincere cooperation he has exhibited so long.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 1811, House bill 2365, for the relief of the city of Chester, Ill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of the city of Chester, Ill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, in keeping with the fine tribute the majority leader has just paid in regard to having received full cooperation, the Republican Members will not object to having the Senate consider the bill at this time, in order to show good faith, pursuant to the request of the majority leader for cooperation.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, that is a marvelous spirit, and I am very grateful for it.

Mr. WHERRY. Of course, there will be argument about the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCAS. I was expecting that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of the city of Chester, Ill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am ready to vote on the bill.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. DONNELL. Will the Senator be kind enough to explain the bill?

Mr. LUCAS. I thought the Senator from Missouri was going to explain it. However, I shall be very glad to give the explanation. My good friend, the late Joe Robinson, at one time told me that when I had the necessary votes, that was the time to proceed. I think I have the votes; that is why I did not desire to argue this question. However, perhaps I do not have the votes; I do not know. The Senator from Missouri is very persuasive, and he gets around a good deal. I hope he has not bothered any of my Democratic friends. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I now read from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of the City of Chester, Ill., having considered the same, report favorably thereon, without amendment, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The purpose of the proposed legislation is that the Army of the United States relieve the city of Chester, Ill., of all obligation to pay for the removal of the wreckage of the old bridge over the Mississippi River at Chester, Ill.

STATEMENT

On July 29, 1944, the Chester Bridge collapsed during a heavy windstorm. Emergency action was taken by the Corps of Engineers to provide safe navigation and about one-half of the wreckage was removed.

In other words, the Corps of Engineers took it upon themselves, at that particular time, after that act of God had destroyed the bridge, to remove a part of the wreckage in order to permit navigation to proceed; but the Corps of Engineers left the other part of the bridge hanging in the river, and told the city of Chester, which is a small city of about 7,000 or 8,000 persons, that it had the obligation of removing the remaining part of the bridge from the river.

The city of Chester could not remove the remainder of the bridge under any circumstances or conditions. Everyone knows that most of the small cities of 7,000 or 8,000 persons, wherever they are located, are in debt; most of them are bonded to the limit of their indebtedness under the constitution under which they were incorporated in the first instance.

It is simply impossible for the city of Chester to remove the remainder of the wreckage of the bridge. Yet this liability continues to hang over the head of that city.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield, but I hope the Senator from Oregon will not make it difficult for me.

Mr. CORDON. I shall endeavor not to do so. I merely seek information in order to be able to determine how I shall vote on this bill. I am sympathetic with its purpose. If the facts support a vote in favor of the bill, I shall be glad to cast such a vote.

However, it seems to me that two questions are to be determined. One is, What about the indebtedness of the city of Chester? Has it reached the limit of its constitutional ability, if it has one, to incur indebtedness?

The second question is, What about the ability of the city of Chester to tax?

Mr. LUCAS. The city of Chester has more than reached the limit of its constitutional ability to pay. I say to the Senator that that part of the bridge will never be removed, so far as the city of Chester is concerned, because it does not have the money with which to undertake its removal.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator from Illinois has been reading from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. In the report I notice the following:

Inasmuch as the wreckage menaces navigation it is now being removed by the Corps of Engineers.

I understand that it has been removed.

I read further from the report:

The expense of this removal was charged to the city of Chester.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not think that is the true status. However, I do not have before me my file on this bill. I thought the Senator from Missouri probably would let the bill go through without any question.

I shall ask Mr. Johnston to call my office and have the large file on the city of Chester brought to me.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. It may be helpful for us to note, on page 2 of the report, in the letter from the Secretary of the Army, the following statement:

The new bridge was opened to traffic on August 24, 1946; however, the city has pleaded inability to effect removal of the wreckage because of financial difficulties.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. CORDON. I read further from the letter appearing in the report:

Inasmuch as the wreckage menaces navigation it is now being removed by the Corps of Engineers, at an estimated cost of $130,000, and the city of Chester has been advised that action to secure reimbursement will be taken when removal is accomplished and the cost determined.

That letter is dated July 8, 1949.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from Oregon for calling my attention to that, because I know that after the storm which destroyed the bridge, the Corps of Engineers in the first instance removed the part of the debris which was in the river, doing so for navigation purposes, and for a long time left the remainder of the bridge hanging there.

After they themselves determined that the city of Chester was financially unable to do the job of removing the rest of the bridge from the river, the Corps of Engineers themselves proceeded, in the interest of navigation, to take what remained of the bridge out of the river. However, now they want to hold the city of Chester liable for that.

In the first place, Mr. President, I contend that the Army engineers, after removing a sufficient amount of the debris from the river to permit navigation on the river, should have proceeded no further. Apparently the portion of the wreckage removed for navigation purposes was sufficient to permit navigation to proceed on the river for a long, long time. The Corps of Engineers had no right then, if they felt it was the duty and obligation of the city of Chester to proceed with the remainder of the removal, to remove the debris clear to the water's edge, thus removing every bit of the debris, and then to charge the cost of that work to the city of Chester. The Corps of Engineers took upon themselves that obligation, and it seems to me they were absolutely unwarranted in doing so.

Everyone knows, certainly, that for navigation purposes it would not be necessary to remove such debris clear to the water's edge, from the center of the stream. However, in the beginning, the Corps of Engineers did remove enough of the debris to permit navigation on the part of those wishing to navigate on the river.

Now that the Senator from Oregon has raised the question, I shall read the entire letter which was written to the Honorable EMANUEL CELLER, chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary:

Reference is made to your recent request for the views of this Department with respect to H. R. 2365, Eighty-first Congress, first session, a bill for the relief of the city of Chester, Ill. The Secretary of Defense has delegated to this Department the responsibility for expressing the views of the National Military Establishment.

On July 29, 1944, the Chester Bridge collapsed during a heavy, windstorm. Emergency action was taken by the Corps of Engineers to provide safe navigation and about one-half of the wreckage was removed at a cost of $123,998. A permit was granted on February 1, 1945, to erect false work for reconstruction of the bridge, conditioned upon removal of the remaining wreckage by the city of Chester within 18 months after the new bridge was opened to traffic. The new bridge was opened to traffic on August 24, 1946; however, the city has pleaded inability to effect removal of the wreckage because of financial difficulties. Inasmuch as the wreckage menaces navigation it is now being removed by the Corps of Engineers, at an estimated cost of $130,000, and the city of Chester has been advised that action to secure reimbursement will be taken when removal is accomplished and the cost determined.

Insofar as has been determined, there is no evidence of neglect or carelessness on the part of the bridge owner that contributed to the collapse of the bridge, and revenue figures since reopening of the bridge to traffic lend support to the plea of financial difficulties made by the city of Chester. Accordingly, this Department will offer no objection to favorable consideration of H. R. 2365.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

Sincerely yours,

GORDON GRAY,
Secretary of the Army.

In other words, Mr. President, here is a report by Gordon Gray, then Secretary of the Army, which shows that there had been an investigation of the financial condition of the city of Chester. He advises the Congress of the United States that the people of Chester are in no position to pay for the removal of the remaining wreckage, estimated to cost $130,000, and that, consequently, there is no objection to favorable consideration of this bill.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

Mr. President, that seems to sum up the situation pretty well. I could go on, and I think perhaps it is just as well to say that on October 8, 1948, the Chester Bridge Commission, by its manager, M. J. Boettcher, addressed a letter to Col. R. E. Smyser, Jr., district engineer, Corps of Engineers, St. Louis, Mo., as follows:

THE CHESTER BRIDGE,
Chester, Ill., October 8, 1948.

In re removal of wreckage of old Chester Bridge from Mississippi River.

Col. R. E. SMYSER, Jr.,
District Engineer, Corps of Engineers,
St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR COLONEL SMYSER: On July 19, 1948, the city council of the city of Chester, Randolph County, Ill., passed ordinance No. 341, which authorized the mayor and the city clerk, for and on behalf of the city, to enter into a contract with the War Department, Corps of Engineers, for the removal of the wreckage of the old Chester highway bridge from the Mississippi River, with the provision for repayment to the Government on an annual basis, after operation and maintenance, accounts past due, and accrued interest, and a minimum of $10,000 per year on the principal was paid, which was subject to the approval of the Chief Engineer.

By letter under date of October 1, 1948, addressed to the Chester Bridge Commission, you advised that the Chief of Engineers had disapproved of the agreement and notified the city of Chester that failing a proper agreement and lacking such authority and funds as the Corps of Engineers had in the removal of the Peoria Bridge, your office would be compelled to refer the case to the Attorney General for necessary action.

Please be advised that the city of Chester has exhausted all avenues toward trying to finance the removal of the bridge; and, because of the prohibitions and ordinance No. 251 and subsequent ordinances, the city of Chester is legally unable to enter into any contract with the War Department, other than on the terms and conditions as were submitted and which were rejected by the Chief Engineer. Our only hope would be congressional action which would relieve us of the dilemma we are in.

Because of the above action, the City Council of the City of Chester met in special session on Thursday evening, October 7, 1948, and passed ordinance No. 345 repealing ordinance No. 341, and passed a resolution to the effect that the city of Chester is unable and cannot remove said wreckage. A certified copy of said ordinance and said resolution is herewith enclosed for your information.

We are very sorry that matters have taken the turn which they have, and we regret very much that the War Department, Corps of Engineers, feel that legal action must be taken to settle this controversy.

Assuring you of our continued cooperation along any line which may be legal and which the city council would have authority to follow, we are

Yours very truly,
CHESTER BRIDGE COMMISSION,
M. J. BOETTCHER, Manager.

The committee report then sets forth the ordinance which was passed by the city of Chester, and then the resolution. I do not believe it is necessary to read either one of those at this time.

Mr. President, there can be no question that the War Department and the Bureau of the Budget have recognized the plight in which the city of Chester now finds itself as the result of the storm which destroyed this bridge. In view of the fact that the Corps of Engineers of the Army has proceeded to remove what is left of the bridge which was destroyed by storm and fell into the river, there is definite evidence that the city of Chester cannot meet its obligation. So I do not believe that the Senate of the United States, considering the record which is here made, desires to keep the city of Chester in the rather difficult position, so far as the future is concerned, of having $130,000 hanging over its head.

If a suit were filed and judgment obtained—I do not know whether a judgment could be obtained or not—it would probably involve a long court procedure. I know the case would go to the Supreme Court of Illinois before the litigation was finally concluded. Someone would have to pay the bill, and, after all, after the litigation was over, there would be no way under God's shining sun by which the Government would ever be able to collect from the city of Chester, because of its financial inability to pay. At the present time there is no prospect of any unusual growth in the population of the city in the near future. I doubt whether any additional territory will be taken into the city, and the result would be that the Government would get nothing.

It seems to me that the people of that city who, during all these years, have tried to keep open the transportation facilities over the river, in order that people might come and go over that unusual and sometimes hazardous river at that point, and who found themselves, by an act of God, through no fault of their own, deprived of a bridge, should not now be subjected to an effort on the part of the United States Senate to fasten that obligation on them.

The House of Representatives apparently recognized the merit of the position taken by the people of the city of Chester. The Department of the Army has recognized it, as has also the Bureau of the Budget. I hope that the Senator from Missouri will finally agree with everyone else about this situation, and that he will let this bill pass, and enable us to proceed with other business.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, has the Senator concluded?

Mr. LUCAS. I have concluded.

Mr. DONNELL. I desire to be heard only very briefly in this subject. The facts are, as I understand them, that in 1939, by Public Law No. 191 of the Seventy-sixth Congress, approved July 18, 1939, the city of Chester was authorized to construct, maintain, and operate the bridge in question across the Mississippi River. The Government of the United States, of course, was under no obligation to grant such permission, but it did. As provided in the bill, the city of Chester was authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over the bridge, and so forth. On July 29, 1944, the Chester bridge collapsed during a heavy windstorm. Shortly after the collapse of the bridge, the United States Corps of Engineers took emergency action and removed about one-half of the wreckage, at a cost of $123,998, as is shown by the letter of Secretary of the Army Gordon Gray, dated July 8, 1949, to which the Senator from Illinois has referred.

That was the situation at the beginning of 1945. Of course, at that time, at the beginning of 1945, the city of Chester had no right to construct a new bridge without the consent of the United States of America. What happened? On February 1, 1945, a permit to erect falsework for the construction of the bridge was issued by the Government, and, as is pointed out in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, this permit was "conditioned upon removal of the remaining wreckage by the city of Chester within 18 months after the new bridge was opened to traffic."

The particular clause to which reference is made, by which this condition was imposed, is set forth at page 3 of the report, and reads:

(K) All wreckage of the old bridge shall be removed by the permittee to permit a clear depth to minus 17 feet on the Chester gage to the satisfaction of the district engineer not later than 18 months after the bridge has been opened to traffic.

The situation then, as disclosed up to February 1, 1945, was that the permit was granted by the Government to erect this falsework for the reconstruction of the bridge, but was conditioned upon removal of the remaining wreckage by the city of Chester within 18 months after the new bridge was opened to traffic. There was no obligation on the city of Chester to accept the permission to erect the bridge. Obviously, by acceptance of the permit, it accepted it subject to the condition which was imposed in the permit which was issued; so, at the conclusion of February 1, 1945, the city of Chester had itself voluntarily accepted the obligation to remove from the river the remaining one-half, approximately, of the wreckage.

Let us not overlook the fact that the Government had already spent $123,998 in removing the wreckage of a bridge, the permit to build which had been granted to the city of Chester, and the city of Chester voluntarily, as I see it, by the acceptance of the permit of February 1, 1945, accepted is under the condition to which I have referred, namely, that the city of Chester remove the remaining wreckage within 18 months after the new bridge was opened to traffic.

On August 24, 1946, the new bridge was opened to traffic, and on July 19, 1948, the City Council of Chester, instead of disclaiming any obligation, as I understand it, passed an ordinance, No. 341, which authorized the mayor and the city clerk to enter into a contract with the War Department Corps of Engineers for the removal of the wreckage, with the provision of repayment to the Government on an annual basis, after operation and maintenance accounts, of past-due and accrued interest, and a minimum of $10,000 a year on the principal was paid.

So we find the City Council of Chester not denying any previous obligation and not denying the fact that it had accepted a permit to build a bridge on the condition the city should remove the wreckage, but itself authorizing by ordinance No. 341 the entrance into a contract with the War Department for the removal of the wreckage. Then, for some reason which I do not know, the contract was disapproved by the Chief of Engineers. On October 7, 1948, ordinance No. 341 was repealed by ordinance No. 345.

Mr. President, so far as I observe to this point there has been no disclaimer on the part of the city of Chester of the obligation which it voluntarily undertook by the acceptance of the permit, subject to condition K, which I quoted. We find that on October 7, 1948, the date on which ordinance 341 was repealed by the city council, the city of Chester asserts the following in its resolution adopted on that date:

Resolved by the mayor and the City Council of the City of Chester, Randolph County, Ill., That the city of Chester disclaims all liability for removal of said wreckage and that further negotiations with the War Department, Corps of Engineers, relative to the removal of the wreckage of the old bridge would be futile, and that because of the financial inability of the city to pay for or assume the obligation of removing the wreckage from the river that the War Department through its Corps of Engineers be advised that the city of Chester is unable and cannot remove said wreckage.

From the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, I understand the wreckage was removed by the the Corps of Engineers and the expense of the removal was charged to the city of Chester. As I understand, at the time Mr. Gray wrote his letter of July 8, 1949, such expense was estimated to be $130,000.

Mr. President, as I see it, the matter simmers down to a situation in which the city of Chester had a bridge in 1944, which the Government had permitted it to build. Thereafter the city was confronted with a situation resulting from destruction of the bridge. The Federal Government voluntarily spent nearly $124,000 to clear away half of the debris. Thereupon the city of Chester agreed to remove the remainder of the wreckage within the period to which I have referred. Solely on the ground of financial inability, coupled with the language of the resolution which I have read, to the effect that the city of Chester disclaims all liability for removal of such wreckage, we find the city of Chester now seeking to avoid payment of approximately $130,000, which I assume was the cost of the removal of the final portion of the wreckage.

I can well appreciate the point which the Senator from Illinois makes so eloquently in support of the city of Chester. On the other hand, it would set an unfortunate precedent for the Senate to accede to the proposition that after a city has made an agreement by virtue of the acceptance of a permit, and has become subject to the conditions of that permit, the city thereafter should, because of its financial inability, be excused from the obligation to pay the sum of money it had agreed to pay.

It is suggested and stated by the Senator from Illinois that the city of Chester is without financial ability to pay the amount. As I see it, that is not the question before us. The question is whether or not an obligation exists which was voluntarily assumed by the city of Chester, and whether such obligation is to be ignored and the city released from it merely because of its present financial inability. If the State of Illinois desires to authorize the city of Chester to increase its bonded indebtedness limit, there is nothing to prevent the State of Illinois from so doing.

Therefore, Mr. President, solely on the ground that the city has accepted a permit of benefit to the city unquestionably, because I assume the previous bridge was undoubtedly of benefit to the city, the city of Chester should not now be permitted to be excused from the payment of an obligation to which it became subject by reason of the acceptance of the permit of February 1, 1945.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the bill pass? Without objection, the bill is passed.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the Chair stated that without objection the bill was passed. Is it necessary that I renew my objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs the Senator's pardon. The question is on the passage of the bill. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" seem to have it, the "ayes" have it, and the bill is passed.

BASIN DEVELOPMENT—COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, the National Reclamation Association at its annual convention last month in Spokane, Wash., had presented to it the report of a special committee which had been set up by President Harry E. Polk. The report contained the results of a study of the potentialities and possibilities of basin reclamation development in the Western States. After the report had been received, the National Reclamation Association adopted a resolution on the subject, which reads:

RESOLUTION 1

BASIN DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE REPORT

Whereas during recent years a trend has developed toward the obtaining and assertion by agencies of the United States of increasing governmental power over the development of water resources and the economy of the 17 Western States, and the control and authority of the States and their agencies over their own future welfare has been correspondingly diminishing; and

Whereas still further extensions of Federal domination over the welfare and economy of the West have been proposed and advocated in connection with a movement to establish Federal valley authorities in the river basins of the Western States; and

Whereas for obvious reasons the National Reclamation Association has rejected the Federal valley authority concept as having no proper place in the American system of government; and

Whereas it is recognized by the association that the most effective and beneficial utilization of the water resources of the West can be obtained through coordinated, basin-wide planning and development; and

Whereas in order that the association should undertake its proper responsibility for leadership of public opinion, in rel tion to basin-wide development, the president of the association has appointed a special basin development committee and said committee has submitted to the association its report, wherein it makes affirmative proposals for solution of problems of basin development: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Reclamation Association:

1. That the association approves the broad, general objectives laid down in the report of the basin-development committee as indicated by the preamble of this resolution;

2. That the association deems it essential that the trend toward Federal domination be reversed;

3. That the basin-development committee report be transmitted to each of the 17 affected States, and interested organizations and agencies, and the interested Federal agencies, for study, review, and comment within a time fixed by the board of directors;

4. That the comments of such States, organizations, and agencies be studied and analyzed by the board of directors, and that its analysis and recommendations be submitted to the twentieth annual meeting of the National Reclamation Association; and

5. That the National Reclamation Association expresses its appreciation to Chairman Marshall Dana and his fellow committeemen for their untiring and fruitful efforts in the study and preparation of the project report.

Mr. President, the report mentioned in the resolution is one of great importance to all western reclamation States. In order that it may be available for study by all persons who are interested in it, I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BASIN DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE REPORT TO NATIONAL RECLAMATION ASSOCIATION, NINETEENTH ANNUAL MEETING, SPOKANE, WASH., NOVEMBER 15, 16, 17, 1950

A PROGRAM

The Basin Development Committee was established in February 1950 by President Harry E. Polk in accordance with the constitution of the National Reclamation Association.

The assignment given to the committee was to develop a program or a plan for river basin development, in all its phases, which would be acceptable to the reclamation interests of the West. President Polk particularly asked that the recommendations of the committee be put in direct and concrete form. Membership of the committee comes from each of the major river basins of the West.

The committee has proceeded with its assignment by considering the aspects of planning, financing, construction, and operation of comprehensive multiple-purpose developments and by exhaustive study of all technique, existing and proposed for handling the complex problems relating to such development.

Techniques receiving particular study in an attempt to determine the advantages and disadvantages of each were: Present Federal agency operation supplemented by interagency committees; interstate compact; river valley authorities; the basin account; and the so-called Watkins bill.

The resulting report is therefore based upon an analysis and an understanding of the problems involved. It is believed that it will serve as the basis for a sound policy and point the way for writing a river basin development plan which will truly serve the interests of the people who are to benefit by, and who will pay for, such development.

BASIN DEVELOPMENT

This is more an appeal than a report. It is an appeal to reverse the trend that is taking control and authority from the local projects of reclamation and making the United States Government the proprietor and total authority.

We hold this trend to be dangerous to the future of reclamation and contrary to the concept of government of, for, and by the people.

We ask for a change of direction, from the grass roots up, rather than from a paternal and regimenting bureaucracy down. We ask for a home rule as the rock upon which the structure of reclamation can be erected to endure through the ages.

We propose MOL—the man on the land.

Let authority, initiative, and action rise from him rather than descend from valley authorities. These we hold to be contrary to the American way and to the spirit of democratic government. The National Reclamation Association has so declared by resolution on eight separate occasions (NRA resolutions opposing valley authorities: No. 4 adopted in 1938; No. 17, 1941; No. 15, 1943; No. 15, 1944; No. 21, 1946; No. 15, 1947; No. 13, 1948; No. 4, 1949) covering more than a decade of time.

We hold for basin development. Dams in series increase the usability of the entire river system, make more certain abundant water for all uses, provide a steadier head of power, and abate pollution.

But the program for river-basin development must not alter the priority for consumptive uses of water, must not abrogate established water rights, must not sacrifice essential local development in order to forward a grandiose scheme.

We suggest that the preferable plan is to knit into the development of an entire river basin the sum of efficient and desirable local projects. The local projects must, in turn, conduce to the widest opportunity and the greatest challenge to the individual—the man on the land.

The foundation of western agriculture was laid by pioneers who ox-teamed with families and furniture, cows and plows, seeds and little trees to the great American desert.

By individual effort they broke the sod, brought water from the branch, built homes, and produced food where for ages the sagebrush, the jackrabbit, and the coyote had flourished under the sun.

By their proof—the proof that individual families could sustain themselves by combining the water and the land for all the accomplishments of civilization—freedom itself pressed forward along the American way, and reclamation became integral in the progress and prosperity of the United States.

Since reclamation was made a national policy by adoption of the act of 1902, western reclamation has become a multi-billion-dollar enterprise. Federal and private reclamation have gone along together to create a balanced, economy of homes and farms, transportation and towns, industry and business, education and religion. The products of reclamation have become indispensable in the feeding of 150,000,000 Americans and have contributed to export trade. Reclamation is a large consumer of power, a conspicuous user of labor-saving machinery, a valued customer of the Nation's factories and mills, an important contribution to America's economic and military strength.

The desert has been made to blossom as the rose.

Water is the key. The supply of water has become the controlling factor in the further development of the American West.

The original purpose was to bring arid and semiarid land, by means of man-applied water, to a level of production at least equal to that of naturally watered land.

In early stages, small attention was given to incidental hydroelectric power, sometimes because of a fear on the part of settlers that power development might trespass upon the development of the land and reduce the available flow of water for farm and domestic uses.

In effectuation of reclamation as a national policy, the Federal Government became a benevolent banker, affording long-time loans without interest and dealing leniently as to final settlements, holding the prosperous establishment of homes and farms to be a first value.

A great body of laws accumulated, dealing with water rights and related questions. As is well recognized, these laws have been adopted in fragmentary and patchwork manner and are unfortunately open to diverse interpretation.

Likewise, it is necessary to say, a growing body of theory and political opportunism began circling around reclamation, hoping to exploit its values and opportunity in behalf of visionary schemes.

And there has been a legitimate growth of the reclamation idea, namely, that in a modern day it must be enlarged to bring about the development of rivers and river basins for all of their uses.

With the liberal appropriations by Congress of almost undreamed sums of money for water resource development has come a concentration of power in Government agencies. For money is power. Quite naturally there is a grasp for more authority on the misguided presumption that with more authority the job can be done quicker and better.

Thus has come the proposal for Federal valley authorities, not from reclamationists, not from those who know how to farm irrigated land or develop projects, but from enthusiasts and theorists in Federal bureaus and from other persons who have never known what it was to build a home and an economy in the wilderness or to generate a kilowatt of electric energy.

This valley authority proposal is to establish the Federal Government through a superimposed agency as investor, owner, and administrator of an entire river basin, sweeping away or subordinating other agencies, particularly the great Federal construction agencies, the Army engineers, and the Reclamation Bureau.

It is a movement that has its value to reclamation and its friends. It puts us on notice that fundamental plans of river-basin development must be enlarged in accord with individual rights and home rule. We must not be too set or too selfish to change. But we propose our kind of change, and that is to recapture the original plan of individual ownership, independence, and businesslike contract responsibly kept.

It has become imperative to check the paternalism which vitiates and stultifies the free American spirit by doing things for Americans instead of creating the area of opportunity in which they can do things for themselves. Such paternalism quickly takes the road to authority and dictatorship.

Here is involved a principle that is as old as the struggle for the freedom of man. It is bedded in the declaration that Government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. It goes farther. In the precepts of democracy the government serves logically and well when it is partner to the people, when it recognizes and cherishes the rights of the individual, and when it aids in establishing those rights—the estate of free men—as banker, as partner, and as servant, but never as master, never as authority superimposed upon the people, but always as authority created by them at the ballot box.

When we examine the specific application of this principle to reclamation, it is to see that the Government's purpose from the beginning is to establish, free of bonds and bondage, the individual upon the land. It is not too great a strain of definition to include the individual man, the family, the district, the community, the State, and the river basin.

We hope now to be able to diagram how river-basin development based upon the man on the land and under the authority of the people can be brought about.

1. The intrastate district: Let district organization be retained under applicable State laws with full recognition that water rights, established in conformity with the laws of the State, are appurtenant to the land and that, upon final performance of contract obligations with the Government, title and rights to incidental power shall pass to the district.

2. The intrastate river basin: When a group of reclamation districts is developed on a river whose flow is wholly confined within the boundaries of a State, let an association of these districts be formed to operate under the laws of the State and in contractual relations with the Federal Government to the end that the entire flow shall be developed, controlled, and apportioned equitably to all land to which water rights can be extended and water supplied, in order that repayment of the loan shall be assured the Federal Government. The incidental power shall also be jointly administered under State regulation, either at the beginning or when contractual obligations with the Government have been satisfied. As in the case of the local district, the association should operate and maintain the works, either directly or through its constituent agencies, and title to the water and power works should after repayment vest in either the association or its constituents.

3. The interstate river basin: Let the States of a river basin, with the participation and advice of the delegated representatives of local districts, either directly or through associations of intrastate districts, formulate interstate compacts. Such interstate compacts must be created with the consent of the Federal Government. Not only that, the Government should be a party to the compacts. Under the compacts the waters of an interstate stream should be apportioned and further authority should be vested in an interstate organization to enter into undertakings with the Federal Government for the cooperative development of an interstate river basin. Administration of incidental power developments should be provided for in the same interstate compacts.

No such interstate compact should be submitted to the Congress of the United States for its approval until the several legislatures have ratified it. Perhaps also such compacts should provide that they shall not be effective until approval has been voted at general elections conducted in the affected areas of each of the several States.

To effectuate necessary planning and estimates, an interagency committee may well function to aid and advise the Interstate Compact Commission. The membership of the committee should be fully representative of all interests concerned, with emphasis on the local interests. This committee should assemble and analyze full information on such problems as surface and underground water supply and storage, apportionment of water, land-use planning, soil conservation costs, fish, wildlife and recreation, hydroelectric power, flood control, and abatement of pollution. It should help to bring about better public understanding and coordination of agencies and duties.

The interstate organization should make all decisions and recommendations to Congress as to what steps should be taken in development of a river basin. Subject to the will of Congress, the interstate organization should direct and initiate the steps of the development.

Wherever construction of multiple-use projects including reclamation and power are undertaken, we believe it desirable that the great construction agencies of the Government should be retained in full vigor and effectiveness for such purposes.

Complete coordination under the leadership of the interstate organization should be the goal of the Federal Government, the Interagency Committee, the Interstate Compact Commission, the States and their people, and the reclamation associations and districts.

4. Basin account: This device should be given consideration as a working arrangement for bookkeeping, for pooling the revenues of the projects of basin development, and providing for proper subsidy to irrigation. We submit:

(a) Land reclamation may be undertaken as an essential part of a general river basin development program in which the over-all benefits obtained from power plants, flood control, and other factors are on the credit side of the ledger both as to the region and as to the Nation.

(b) Subsidy may be applied to irrigation costs in excess of what settlers can pay for construction involving projects that thereafter can pay their way through production.

(c) Subsidy should not, unless in exceptional circumstances not now visible, be applied to projects that cannot be economically operated and maintained after construction.

(d) The policy in irrigation should be as affirmative as honesty and good sense validate, since food production and the establishment of homes, farms, towns, transportation, and other aspects of a balanced economy depend upon successful agriculture.

(e) Since the basin account is a device for bookkeeping, planning, budgeting, and subsidy of irrigation, its administration should not be given any one agency (specifically, the Interior Department), nor should such agency be given exclusive authority over rates for electric power.

(f) It would appear to be better practice to allow the Federal Power Commission to retain its legally assigned rate-making authority in conference with the Interagency Committee and the Interstate Compact Commission.

(g) There should be continuous counsel with State and local authority in questions of policy, rates, terms of repayment, and general administration.

5. Interstate operation: The same interstate organization (Federal-State-local) setup to plan, finance, and develop multiple-purpose projects should be employed to administer these projects after completion and hold title to them and their benefits once debt is liquidated.

In the outline here offered it is not proposed to interfere with the Federal functions of flood control, navigation, conservation, the construction of locks and harbor facilities, and other responsibilities that traditionally fall within the scope of Federal activities.

The fact that the Federal Government advances funds for development, part or all of which is to be repaid, should not change the debtor-creditor relationship between the State or a State agency. When the debt is paid, the debtor States or districts should be free to function in conformity with the desires of the people in the States concerned.

The basin-wide multiple-purpose projects present problems of administration which call for governmental mechanisms adequate to the task involved and yet fully representative of the people concerned. These mechanisms preferably should be initiated by the people.

We make the point that the valley authorities in the form of federally chartered corporations after the TVA pattern are ill suited for the task of conserving the property rights established under State laws, such as water rights created by the appropriation of water to become appurtenant to the land. They are objectionable in their destruction of local autonomy in government. An overwhelming majority of the people in the reclamation States oppose valley authorities and should never be forced to yield to them without their voted consent.

The new form of governmental problems presented by basin-wide developments, involving irrigation, generation, and distribution of electric energy, soil conservation, flood control, navigation, preservation and development of wildlife, development and utilization of recreational facilities, and other elements, calls for an administrative unit drawn from the various levels of government, local, State, and Federal—a new type of compact. Such a governmental structure would be adequate for the task to be performed. It should be in line with recommendations for interstate organization. It would give promise of successful maintenance of property rights created and existing under State laws. It would conform to our American concept of government as being in response to the desires of the people. It would avoid a vested ownership and economic control by Federal instrumentalities over areas comprehended by America's great river basins. It would avoid centralization of power, both political and economic, in the Federal Government.

As funds are provided for reimbursement to the Federal Treasury, it would be possible to give recognition to the proprietary interest which should be permanent, not in the Federal Government, but in those who have paid the bills.

It would provide home rule.

Yet we may thus continue to benefit from the ability of the Federal Government to finance vast multiple-purpose projects which are beyond the financing abilities of private organizations, State agencies, or the States themselves. The Government in such financing and cooperation may well thereby recognize its responsibilities as steward of public lands and contributor to the social and economic establishment of key areas having special problems.

During the past 20 years, the American people through their elected representatives have chosen to increase markedly the activities in the field of natural resource development and use. Even though the defense effort may temporarily reduce the activity, the defense needs of the Nation increase the necessity for the products of such development.

The problem is one that calls for reorientation and coordination of policies, agencies, and the development program as a whole. No longer can we limit our own plan to the development of water resources for irrigation.

The actual administrative relationship of agencies must be submitted to the test of coordination and thus of the right to continue to serve. Plans must be thus tested.

The prime objective—orderly development with efficiency—must no longer be a smoke screen for the promotion of ideas which are not American but which will eventually result, if adopted, in the complete domination of the economic life of the people by representatives of the Federal Government.

We have advanced a plan which we believe will save from destruction the fundamental relationships between local, State, and national governments with emphasis upon the basic unit of government and progress—the man on the land. Local water users shall have their proper voice in the development of resources from which we live.

It will be possible, also, we believe, to preserve the necessary checks and balances of government in a free society.

The water-development program must not be used as a tool for fastening the blanket of domination by any Federal agency over the economic life of the people who are to benefit from the development.

The problems of planning, financing, constructing, and managing natural resource development programs are all more efficiently solved when the talents, the interest and support of all agencies of Government and of all units in the body politic are sought after, recognized and considered. If the natural resource development program is to succeed, then the philosophy of Federal domination must be replaced by one which will emphasize the place of the water users who should have first place in the planning and authority in the accomplishment and final ownership of the lands, the water rights and the power.

Natural resource development programs must, indeed, spring from the land and the people through their votes and their elected representatives. The voice of the agencies which are promoting their welfare and the appropriations must be replaced by the legitimate voice of the people who have to pay for the programs.

The philosophy of a top-heavy program, promoted from the top down, must be discarded. In its place must be a program linked to a philosophy which will build on the firm foundation of the land and water combined, those mutual relationships and fair play that belong to the spirit of America.

Now, in rapid review, we propose:

1. That the reclamation district shall be the basic unit in land and water development and the primary source of authority for action.

2. That under private ownership the water shall be appurtenant to the land together with incidental hydroelectric energy.

3. That the Federal Government shall withdraw as owner and administrator both of water resources and power when contractual obligations have been satisfied.

4. That associations of reclamation districts may be formed for the development of intrastate river basins including reclamation of land and the development of hydroelectric energy.

5. That such associations shall be administered under State law and regulation.

6. That interstate river-basin development shall be set up and administered through interstate compacts, including representation of all interests properly concerned, implemented by interagency committees and using for bookkeeping, planning, and other proper purposes the device of the so-called basin account.

The Committee on Basin Development can offer no conclusion more mature than the fact that reports do not of themselves solve problems, nor do resolutions alone meet a duty.

We have given such thought to the way in which the policy we have outlined and the program we have recommended may be implemented.

We therefore propose:

1. That the National Reclamation Association forthwith declare its approval of this report.

2. That it accept MOL—the Man on the Land—as the title of the movement to be undertaken.

3. That it direct the incorporation of this movement in basic national reclamation policy as such policy is represented by this association.

4. That a continuing committee be created, its duties:

(a) To effectuate action by the association in harmony with this report.

(b) To secure the necessary legal adjustments and legislation essential to such effectuation.

(c) To transmit the association's program to all reclamation districts and other groups concerned with reclamation.

5. That the continuing committee be accorded power of action under the direction of the president and the board of directors of the National Reclamation Association.

6. That the board of directors be authorized to budget and to meet the necessary expenses of the continuing committee in the performance of its assigned duties.

MOL—the Man on the Land—is offered to the National Reclamation Association as a means which will be effective in the multiple-purpose projects of river-basin development. We have presented principles which must be worked out in plan, organization, law, and procedure. But we have tried at the same time to offer a contribution to the efficiency of democratic principles.

Our success as a democracy has been due to the fact that no man, no group of men nor even a centralized government have had the final say. Eventually we have found the best course suited to the most people.

We offer MOL as a revolutionary change of direction in reclamation. We believe that the plan we submit is true to the principle of self-government and that we can govern ourselves. It embodies home rule, and we will submit to no other ruler.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there is one bill on the calendar which we could make the unfinished business. The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] is trying to get in touch with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] with reference to considering the bill at this time. If possible I should like to be able to dispose of it this afternoon. I am certain that if we could take up the amendment submitted by the Senator from Indiana, which deals with FEPC legislation, we could conclude consideration of the measure within a short time.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Is it the understanding that if the bill is not disposed of the so-called freight-forwarding bill will be considered?

Mr. LUCAS. We shall dispose of the freight-forwarding bill sometime tomorrow. Perhaps we shall have a late session, although I do not think it will take too long. Has the Senator from Nebraska been able to get in touch with the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I answer the distinguished majority leader by saying that no sooner had I left the Senate Chamber than the bill then pending was passed. I have been unable to reach the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER]. I respectfully ask, if it be convenient, that I be permitted at least to confer with the Senator from Indiana. After the motion to take up the statehood bill was withdrawn, there was some question as to when the freight forwarders bill would be brought forward. I should like very much, if possible, to inform the Senator from Indiana, and I ask the majority leader to extend me that privilege. I will consult the Senator from Indiana as soon as possible.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. WHERRY. In view of the program which has been outlined, and the notice given by the majority leader, I have no objection to making the freight forwarders' bill the unfinished business, with the undestanding that it be debated tomorrow when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] can be present. I am quite sure that the Senator from Ohio would want me to object until he can be present. I am satisfied that the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] understands the situation. Is there some other bill that the Senator from Illinois would like to take up?

Mr. LUCAS. Let me inquire from the Senator from Washington whether or not he can proceed with his part of the discussion of the freight forwarders' bill this afternoon, and get it into the RECORD. In that way we can make some time.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Illinois that it is not my bill, although I participated in many of the hearings.

Mr. LUCAS. Whose bill is it?

Mr. MAGNUSON. It is really the bill of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado]. I am quite familiar with its provisions, having participated in the hearings. It would be necessary for me to assemble a great deal of data tonight, even if the debate were to be postponed until tomorrow, because the question is a very technical one.

FREIGHT FORWARDERS AND MOTOR COMMON CARRIERS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I do not wish to place any burden on the Senator from Washington, so I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 2265, House bill 5967, with the understanding that there will be no vote on the bill before tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 5967) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, to clarify the status of freight forwarders and their relationship with motor common carriers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to make one further inquiry of the majority leader. Does his request mean that we are to begin to debate the bill this afternoon?

Mr. LUCAS. If any Senator desires to speak on the bill, he may do so.

Mr. WHERRY. I would greatly appreciate it if the discussion could be postponed until tomorrow.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I do not think we should proceed with the debate this afternoon.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask the distinguished majority leader to modify his request, or have an understanding to that effect.

Mr. LUCAS. We will have an understanding that it will not be debated this afternoon, because if the Senator from Washington is not ready to debate it, I do not think any other Senator is prepared to do so.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5967) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, to clarify the status of freight forwarders and their relationship with motor common carriers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At this point the chair desires to state for the RECORD that the pending business is House bill 5967, a bill to amend the Interstate Commerce Act. It is known as the freight forwarders' bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the unfinished business, of course, is the so-called rent-control joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. On which a vote is to be taken at 2 o'clock on Thursday afternoon of this week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to consider executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Lt. Col. William R. Shuler, Corps of Engineers, to serve as a member of the California Debris Commission, vice Brig. Gen. Walter D. Luplow, which was referred to the Committee on Public Works.

NOMINATION OF MICHAEL V. DI SALLE—EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, I report favorably the nomination of Michael V. Di Salle, of Ohio, to be the Director of Price Stabilization. There was a meeting of the committee this morning, at which Mr. Di Salle appeared, and there was some testimony. I am authorized to say that there is no objection to the nomination, although unfortunately some of the members of the committee were out of the city, and did not take part in the hearing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be received, and placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask that this nomination go over temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and the nomination will go over temporarily.

MUNITIONS BOARD

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John D. Small, of New York, to be Chairman of the Munitions Board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

MUNICIPAL COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Andrew J. Howard, Jr., of the District of Columbia, to be associate judge of the Municipal Court for the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REDEVELOPMENT LAND AGENCY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John A. Remon, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency for the term expiring March 3, 1955.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

ECONOMIC STABILIZATION AGENCY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Alan Valentine, of New York, to be Economic Stabilization Administrator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed. That completes the Executive Calendar.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, December 6, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate December 5 (legislative day of November 27), 1950:

CALIFORNIA DEBRIS COMMISSION

Lt. Col. William R. Shuler, Corps of Engineers, to serve as member of the California Debris Commission provided for by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1893, entitled "An act to create the California Debris Commission and regulate hydraulic mining in the State of California," vice Brig. Gen. Walter D. Luplow, to be relieved.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate December 5 (legislative day of November 27), 1950:

MUNITIONS BOARD

John D. Small, of New York to be Chairman of the Munitions Board.

MUNICIPAL COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Hon. Andrew J. Howard, Jr., of the District of Columbia, to be associate judge of the municipal court for the District of Columbia.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REDEVELOPMENT LAND AGENCY

John A. Remon, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency for the term expiring March 3, 1955.

ECONOMIC STABILIZATION AGENCY

Alan Valentine, of New York, to be Economic Stabilization Administrator.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who art the Lord God omnipresent, omniscient, and omnipotent, in this moment of prayer we are beseeching Thee for a greater faith in Thy presence, wisdom, and power.

Grant that our faith in these attributes of Thy divine being may not simply be a formal creed which we affirm and profess but may it be a real personal experience.

May it be a source of peace and power enabling us to conquer all our fears and anxieties and strengthening us for every trial and tribulation.

We pray that our President, our Speaker, and all the Members of this legislative body may be richly endowed with faith. May they be blessed with a calm and confident spirit which is essential to wise judgment and decision and which will inspire them to carry on with courage and steadfast purpose.

Give us daily the firm conviction that Thou hast placed us in a moral universe and that righteousness and justice and all the spiritual values of freedom, good will, kindness, purity, love, and peace must prevail.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

[Mr. THOMAS addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute to explain a motion to recommit that will be offered to the pending tax bill, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

REPUBLICAN MOTION TO RECOMMIT TAX BILL

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, December 4, Secretary Snyder in his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee said:

The revenue yield of the House bill (H. R. 9827) is about $3,000,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 short of the President's recommendation, and unless the bill is modified to increase its yield it will not meet the objective set by the administration, even before the recent deterioration of the international situation.

To meet this challenge for more revenue, when the Nation is facing a possible Dunkerque in Korea, and to more effectively: First, take the profits out of war; second, raise additional revenue; and third, combat the rising cost of living, the Republican minority will move that H. R. 9827 be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report it back forthwith with two simple amendments to provide: A, that the corporate surtax be raised by five percentage points; and B, that the average earnings credit be 100 percent instead of 85 percent.

The Republican motion should be adopted for the following reasons:

First. It will raise at least $500,000,000 more revenue than H. R. 9827.

At a $40,000,000,000 level of corporate profits the Republican proposal will yield approximately $3,500,000,000—$500,000,000 more than the $3,000,000,000 estimated under H. R. 9827.

At a $48,000,000,000 corporate profits level the Republican proposal will yield approximately $6,400,000,000, or $1,800,000,000 more than the $4,600,000,000 estimated under H. R. 9827. This estimate is made by the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

Second. It will substantially reduce the hardships and discriminations in H. R. 9827 and at the same time will spread the increased tax loads more equitably.

Under H. R. 9827 between 70,000 and 80,000 corporations will be subjected to the special 75-percent tax which will apply to all profits greater than 85 percent of their normal profits. By permitting corporations to earn 100 percent of their normal profits before being subjected to the 75-percent levy, the number of corporations to which the special 75-percent levy applies will be reduced. H. R. 9827 consists of two pages imposing the tax and approximately 146 of exceptions, special rules, exemptions, credits, and so forth. By increasing the average earnings basis to 100 percent the need for corporations to seek relief under these 146 complicated pages will be reduced.

At the same time, however, by increasing the surtax rate by 5 percentage points not just 70,000 or 80,000 corporations but the 300,000 taxable corporations with surtax net income over $25,000 will pay some increased tax to help meet our defense program. The 100,000 corporations with taxable income of $25,000 or less will not be affected.

Third. It will limit the application of the special 75-percent rate to what can more fairly be described as war profits.

A basic fallacy and defect of H. R. 9827 is that no attempt has been made to limit the application of the special 75-percent rate to excess profits alone but instead normal profits and excess profits have been deliberately confused.

At best it is recognized that there is no satisfactory formula to determine excess income because no statutory formula can ever be devised which fairly measures normal profits for all corporate taxpayers. H. R. 9827 uses the period 1946–49 as the basis for measuring normal profits although in this period corporations experienced severe fluctuations. Instead, however, of permitting a credit of 100 percent of the average income of the three best years in this period, H. R. 9827 reduces the credit to 85 percent. Profits over 85 percent of this period are subject to the special 75-percent rate. If the earnings of the period 1946–49 are determined to be normal, why should they be reduced? No justification has ever been made for reducing the yardstick of normal earnings by 15 percent except on the grounds that it will produce additional revenue. But if normal profits are to be taxed as proposed in this bill, then at least they should be taxed equitably between all corporations. There is no reason why the inequities of H. R. 9827 should be applied to both normal profits and excess profits.

Fourth. It will make H. R. 9827 less inflationary.

It is recognized that any tax which imposes a high marginal rate on profits greater than any fixed base is inherently inflationary. The basic reason is that this type of a tax creates two different dollars—one dollar for normal profits worth 55 cents after taxes and the other dollar worth, in the case of H. R. 9827, only 25 cents after the special 75-percent tax. In effect two different currencies are established and the yardstick by which productive enterprises make decisions is naturally influenced by which dollar is involved. What could not be afforded in the way of higher wages, increased personnel, and higher prices for materials under the 55-cent dollar becomes relatively cheap under the 25-cent dollar.

The natural result is that the inflationary factors which are now at work are given a strong boost.

By applying the special 75-percent rate to 15 percent of normal profits as well as to all excess profits the amount of cheaper corporate dollars is increased by approximately $1,200,000,000. To this large extent H. R. 9827 is unduly and unnecessarily inflationary at the very time when the cost of living has reached an all-time high.

The Republican proposal would cut down by approximately $1,200,000,000 the number of inflationary dollars.

WHAT IS THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY?

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, we are asked to support the President in this crisis. Obviously that is the duty of all Americans, but how can we support the President unless we know what the President stands for? How can we support the foreign policy of the United States unless we know what it is?

As one of the first two Members of Congress ever to fight in combat under the United Nations flag I think it is of primary importance that we support the activities of those who have done the dying for us in Korea. The State Department has consistently failed to inform any but a very few Members of Congress of what it is doing and they do not tell those Members much. We do not expect that they will tell us matters of high level military strategy or great foreign policy import of the utmost secrecy, but it is high time that the State Department and the President of the United States took the Congress of the United States and the individual Members of this Congress into their confidence.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. HALE asked and was given permission to address the House for 25 minutes tomorrow, following the legislative business of the day and special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., asked and was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes tomorrow, following the legislative program of the day and special orders heretofore entered.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING FOR SERVICE-CONNECTED VETERANS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President sent a message to Congress requesting the Congress to act immediately on a bill providing compensation and training under Public Law 16 for the disabled veterans of world war III. He also suggested, and I heartily approve, giving GI benefits to the men coming out of the war who are not disabled. After the Korean War started I introduced bills giving these men these benefits and insurance benefits. They should have been passed then. They should be passed immediately. Certainly no group of men suffered more under extremely difficult situations than the boys who are now fighting for us in Korea. They deserve our gratitude and our help. We must not fail them.

ANSWER TO PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S MESSAGE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, the President submitted a message to the Congress urging the extension of Public Law 16 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, to provide education and training for service-connected veterans who are disabled as a result of their service in the Korean War.

I want to call to the attention of the House that on the first day that Congress resumed session on November 27, I introduced H. R. 9775, which will carry out the purpose enunciated in that message.

This bill would continue the program under which World War II veterans were rehabilitated and qualified for civilian employment. It was originally enacted in 1943, and in effect, is a continuation of a program started after World War I.

At an early date, I expect to have an executive session of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs to consider this measure.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the majority leader as to the program for tomorrow? I understand there has been another change in the program and I would like to know what it is.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Banking and Currency has reported a bill extending rent control for 3 months. The Committee on Rules will meet this afternoon. If a rule is reported out I shall program that bill for consideration. The bill in relation to the separation of airmail was assigned subject, of course, to other important legislation having prior consideration. So if a rule is reported out this afternoon the rent control bill will come up for consideration tomorrow.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We have every reason to expect that is what will happen?

Mr. McCORMACK. I hope so.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'TOOLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Raymond Moley.

Mr. PERKINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, in one to include an editorial entitled "Get Out of Korea or Fight China," and in the other a letter from Hal J. Miller.

Mr. DOLLINGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three separate instances, and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. RIVERS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include three editorials.

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two separate instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. ARENDS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a resolution adopted by the Rotary Club, of Atlanta, Ill.

Mr. NICHOLSON asked and was given permission to extend in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Jurors Unshaken in Verdict Sacco and Vanzetti Guilty," notwithstanding that it exceeds the limit and is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $533.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include several resolutions.

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article entitled "God and the Welfare State" which is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $266.50.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 289]

Bates, Ky.	Jennings	Pfeiffer, William L.
Beall	Kearns	Philbin
Buckley, Ill.	Kee	Powell
Byrne, N. Y.	Keefe	Rooney
Cannon	Kelley, Pa.	Roosevelt
Cavalcante	Kennedy	Sanborn
Crosser	Kirwan	Shelley
Davenport	LeCompte	Sheppard
Davies, N. Y.	Lichtenwalter	Smathers
Dingell	McGuire	Smith, Ohio
Eaton	McMillen, Ill.	Van Zandt
Gavin	Marcantonio	Vursell
Gillette	Miller, Calif.	Whitaker
Hays, Ark.	Morrison	White, Idaho
Hébert	O'Konski	Whitten
Herter	Patman
Huber	Pfeifer, Joseph L.
Jackson, Calif.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call, 369 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

EXCESS-PROFITS TAX ACT OF 1950

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9827, with Mr. WALTER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill, H. R. 9827, is before the House today for consideration by a vote of 19 to 6 of the members of the Ways and Means Committee. This bill is in response to the mandate contained in section 701 of the Revenue Act of 1950.

It will be remembered that there was considerable interest manifested in an excess-profits tax during the last session of Congress and an effort was made in the other body to include an amendment providing an excess-profits tax. At that time, after considerable debate, it finally resulted in section 701 being included in the Revenue Act of 1950 which provided that the Committee on Ways and Means should report an excess-profits tax bill at this session of the Congress.

Your committee began work on November 15 and held public hearings for several days. From that time up until now it has given consideration to this subject in executive session. I believe it is fair to say that the pending bill is a better measure than I ever hoped we would be able to provide, especially with the limited time that we had to devote to this important subject.

This excess-profits tax bill is patterned very closely along the lines of the excess-profits tax law of World War II, but is much more liberal in many provisions and deals much more leniently with the taxpayer than did the Excess Profits Tax Act of World War II. This bill provides for one thing, and one thing only, and that is an excess-profits tax on corporations. No other tax provisions are included in this measure except such provisions as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this bill.

This bill is to be effective from July 1, 1950, and is estimated to yield $3,400,000,000 of revenue for the first calendar year and $4,600,000,000 of revenue for the next calendar year. The bill includes what is known as the alternative plan to be used by corporations in arriving at their excess-profits-tax credit. It provides for the use of what is known as the average-earnings method or the invested-capital method. The base period provided is the 4 years from 1946 to 1949, inclusive. A corporation may take the 3 best out of the 4 years in arriving at this excess-profits-tax credit. If the corporation elects to use the invested-capital method it is allowed a certain return on the invested capital of its business. For the first $5,000,000 it is allowed to make 12 percent; for the next $5,000,000, 10 percent; and all above $10,000,000, 8 percent. The rate provided under this bill is 75 percent, and is applied to 85 percent of the average for the base-period years, if the average-earnings credit is elected. There is an over-all ceiling of 67 percent which applies to the corporation's income tax and excess-profits tax. In other words, not more than 67 percent of the corporation's earnings can be affected by the combined corporation taxes.

It is estimated that this bill will affect about 70,000 of the largest corporations in the country. A specific credit of $25,000 is provided, which is especially in the interest of the smaller corporations of the country and will result, in many of them, in fact, we believe most of them, not having to pay an excess-profits tax. Adequate provisions are included for new and expanding businesses, and a growth formula is provided that will take care of the normal and expected growth of corporations.

Now, with your indulgence, I would like to take a few minutes to very briefly compare some of the most important provisions in the pending bill with the excess-profits tax in effect during World War II. As I said a moment ago, the rate provided under this bill is 75 percent.

Under the World War II Excess Profits Tax Act the rate was 95 percent, and was effective at 85½ percent after the postwar refund was allowed.

The over-all rate limitation on income and excess-profits taxes under this bill is 67 percent. Under the World War II act it was 80 percent, and was 72 percent after the postwar refund.

The minimum credit or exemption under this bill is $25,000. Under the World War II Excess Profits Tax Act a $10,000 specific exemption was provided.

There is a choice of earnings credit or invested-capital credit, whichever produces the lower tax.

The base period under this bill is from 1946 through 1949. Under the World War II Excess Profits Act the base period was 1936 through 1939.

As to the earnings credit and elimination of poor years in the base period, the taxpayer may select the best three out of four base-period years under this bill. There was no such selection provided under the World War II act. Also any deficits in the 3 years chosen may be raised to zero. There was no such provision in the World War II act.

The earnings credit, adjustment in average base-period earnings, is reduced to 85 percent. Under the World War II act it was 95 percent.

Under the invested-capital credit, the rate of return on equity and retained earnings is on the first $5,000,000, 12 percent. Under the World War II act it was 8 percent. On the next $5,000,000 under this bill it is 10 percent. Under the World War II act it was 6 percent. On all over $10,000,000 under this bill the credit is 8 percent. Under the World War II act it was 5 percent.

Invested-capital credit—rate of return on borrowed capital: The interest deduction under this bill is allowed in full. Under the World War II act it was limited to one-half. The additional allowance is one-third of the interest rate with a ceiling of 3 percent and, in the case of long-term obligations, a floor of 1 percent. Under the World War II act credit was given for one-half the amount of borrowed capital.

There is a total allowance under this bill of 133 percent of interest payable, subject to the floor and the ceiling I have just mentioned.

Under the earnings credit, additions to capital are allowed during the base period. There is an upward adjustment in the earnings credit permitted for any net additions to equity capital, retained earnings, and borrowed capital in 1949 and for one-half of any such additions in 1948. No adjustments of this type were allowed under the World War II act.

There is also a rate of upward adjustment for such net additions to equity capital and retained earnings of 12 percent, and a rate of upward adjustment for such net additions to borrowed capital of one-third of the interest rate.

Under both the earnings credit and the invested-capital credit, upward adjustment is made for net addition to equity capital and retained earnings after the base period. For all taxpayers, allowance at the rate of 12 percent is provided on both equity capital and new retained earnings. Under the World War II act there were no such liberal provisions provided.

Under the earnings credit, provision is made for the downward adjustment for net reductions in equity capital and retained earnings after the base period at the rate of 12 percent. Under the World War II act that rate was 6 percent.

Under the earnings credit certain reductions in borrowed capital after the base period are taken into account. The adjustment downward is equal to one-third of the interest rate. There were no such provisions provided under the World War II act.

Another important provision relates to new corporations organized after the beginning of the base period. As an alternative to its usual credit the taxpayer may apply to its invested capital after 3 years of growth or at the end of the base period, if later, the average rate of return on invested capital for its industry in the base period.

In the case of a substantial change during the base period in a product or a service by the corporation organized before 1946, an alternative credit is provided. The taxpayer may apply industry rates of return to its invested capital and may get the benefit of that. In other words the experience of the industry as reflected upon the business of this individual corporation may be used as a credit.

For smaller corporations, organized before the beginning of the base period, and experiencing growth in the base period, an alternative credit is provided. Such a taxpayer meeting the following requirements may use 1949 earnings, or the average of 1948 and 1949 earnings as its average base-period earnings, if in the last half of the base period its payroll was 30 percent higher, or its gross receipts were 50 percent higher than in the first half of the base period, and its assets did not exceed $20,000,000 at the beginning of the base period.

Mr. Chairman, provision is made for the exclusion of nonrecurrent items of income and deductions in computing the excess-profits net income. For the excess-profits credit of public utilities a minimum of 5 percent after taxes on both equity and borrowed capital in the case of airplanes and railroads is provided, and 6 percent in the case of most other public utilities. Provision is made for the carry-back and carry-forward of net operating losses, 1-year carry-back and 5 years carry-forward. As to unused excess-profits credit the carry-back and carry-forward is provided—1 year of carry-back and 5 years of carry-forward.

Mr. Chairman, as I indicated in my opening remarks your committee has given very careful and adequate consideration to this very difficult problem and brings you this bill today feeling confident that it is worthy of your most careful consideration and support.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. FORD. I would like to have a little specific information on the difference between the $25,000 minimum credit in the pending bill and the $10,000 specific exemption that was in the law after World War II.

Mr. COOPER. Under the World War II act a corporation was allowed a specific exemption of $10,000. Under this bill the corporation is allowed a credit of not to exceed $25,000. In other words, the specific exemption of $10,000 was just given as an exemption, but under this bill the corporation is allowed a minimum credit of $25,000. In other words, if a corporation has a credit of $10,000, it may be brought up to the $25,000, and that amount of credit applied.

Mr. FORD. Why do they use different phraseology? Why could it not have been a $25,000 specific exemption? Why do you change the phraseology?

Mr. COOPER. It was thought better, and would meet the exact problem that was now apparent better than the old method.

Mr. FORD. In effect, is it a $25,000 specific exemption?

Mr. COOPER. Well, for all practical purposes it amounts to that for corporations with average earnings below $25,000.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. Is it not true that as the committee agreed upon the $25,000 specific exemption in lieu of the $25,000 minimum credit, the revenue under the bill would have been decreased by approximately $400,000,000?

Mr. COOPER. There would have been a great effect on the revenue.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the gentleman point in the bill specifically to what was done with respect to the objections of the radio industry and the aircraft industry, who claimed that because they had spent so much money on television and new models, respectively, the earnings in the 1946–49 period were not a fair base, compared to the fact that they were going to profit from those improvements in the following years?

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that he read the RECORD of yesterday, beginning at page 16088, the answer to that question given by his colleague.

Mr. JAVITS. That refers specifically to these two items?

Mr. MILLS. It does.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does this bill in any sense interfere with the renegotiation statute as it was reenacted by the supplemental defense appropriation bill in 1948?

Mr. COOPER. No. This bill has no relation whatever to the Renegotiation Act. I might say to the gentleman that the Committee on Ways and Means has that subject under consideration now. In fact, we have already held public hearings on renegotiation, and have reached the point that it was thought advisable for a little time to be allowed for some of the departments to reconcile some of the different views that were apparent, and for that reason we have suspended. But I feel confident that the committee will come forward with an adequate renegotiation bill to take care of the situation during this war, as it did during the last war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In the supplementary appropriation bill for 1948, when we provided additional funds for the Air Force, we provided that renegotiation would be reinstituted for that money and for any money merged with it. So it is now applicable to many defense contracts at the present time.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. What the gentleman is saying is that the committee has had hearings and expects to expand the existing defense funds renegotiation statute in a comprehensive way to meet the current war situation?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. HOBBS. I simply rise, Mr. Chairman, to thank the distinguished gentleman who has just addressed us for the very lucid explanation that he has made of the bill, and the explanations that have been made by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and his associates. I want to tell the gentleman of our gratitude in the way that the committee has seen fit to bring in this piece of legislation which, as he expressed it so carefully, is more liberal and still accomplishes the purposes sought by the House.

Mr. COOPER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] be given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill which the House has under consideration today, H. R. 9827, in over-all is a disappointment to me because it will not raise as much revenue as I would like to see raised. But since it is a question of getting at some excess-profits taxes or failing to get at any, I had to compromise in the committee on many of the provisions. As we all realize, additional revenue will have to be raised in the immediate future from normal and surtaxes on corporations.

The most vocal opposition to an excess-profits tax bill in any form before our committee was voiced primarily by big corporations. The smaller businesses admitted in general that an excess-profits tax law should be enacted, and offered many constructive suggestions as to how such a law should be drafted.

I would liked to have seen at least $5,000,000,000 or more raised by this bill. It could have been done very easily, and corporations would have been able to pay this $5,000,000,000 in additional taxes and still have more left after taxes than they did last year. Corporation profits after taxes in the second quarter of 1950 were at an annual rate of $22,000,000,000. For the year 1949, corporation profits, after taxes, were $17,000,000,000. Within the last few months, corporation profits have risen $51 percent.

We must all remember that the period since World War II has been a period of unusual business prosperity throughout the country due to built-up demands, accumulated savings during World War II, and large postwar defense expenditures. This is directly a result of World War II, and is adequate justification for not allowing 100 percent of the base-period years 1946–49 as normal earnings. We certainly should have used 75 percent of this base period rather than the 85 percent which is contained in the bill.

This bill is much more equitable and liberal than the World War II excess-profits tax law. Many of the complaints which were levied at the World War II law and suggestions which were made as to how the new law should be written have been taken care of in this bill.

I would like to put the House on notice now that I will not vote for a repeal of this law when conditions are again normal until wartime excise taxes have been repealed.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, Americans are quite unanimous in their feeling that individuals or business concerns should not be permitted to unjustly enrich themselves while others are making the sacrifices of war. I concur in that sentiment.

Great difficulties are encountered in writing a tax bill that will conform to this general principle. The people of the country expect the Congress to pass a bill that is sound, anti-inflationary, and one that is for the best interests of our American economy. They expect the application of an excess-profits law to be fair as between one business concern and another business concern, or many concerns. This bill is a disappointment not in regard to its objectives but in regard to the pattern it follows and the lack of thorough consideration that it received. In voting for it, I sincerely hope that the Senate Finance Committee and the Senate as a body can greatly improve the details of this measure.

While this bill will take from our American economy several billion dollars, the measure has not received the committee's study that it should have had.

Let me say that our chairman in his usual way was fair and courteous, that he granted to every member every possible consideration insofar as he could in the time allotted. I have no objection to what transpired before the bill was sent to the drafting service. I do, however, wish to say something about it from that point on.

This proposal consists of 148 pages. The committee received it one morning about 10 o'clock, and the bill was approved before 12 o'clock noon that same day. The committee did not have an opportunity to read the bill section by section and discuss its meaning or offer amendments to improve the bill. A staff member appeared with a copy of the bill. He would, for instance, advise us that page 1 did certain things, then call our attention to a few lines on page 2, and then refer us to certain lines on page 7. In this way the committee skipped through the bill. This Congress has received a mandate from no one to be anything other than thorough and careful in the writing of legislation.

A staff member who was charged with drafting duties informed the committee that the bill contained certain sections that he himself had not read, that because of the shortness of time others, including men from the Treasury Department, had drawn certain sections. They were thrown together without an opportunity for even the drafting service to read their finished product in its entirety.

It is also a fact that the committee never held a truly executive session. There were some sessions where the taxpaying public was excluded, but a large number of the Treasury staff and employees were always present.

It is regrettable that someone has not come up with a better formula to tax those profits that are excessive, unjust wartime profits. This bill may be an improvement in some regard over the law that existed during World War II. Generally speaking, however, it follows the same pattern used in World War I and II. This calls for the determination of the normal regular income of a business concern and taxing the profits over that amount at a high rate. In this bill the rate is 75 percent.

There are many weaknesses about such a formula in taxing excess profits. As a general rule, a concern with modest profits during a base period will pay a very heavy excess-profits tax, while a concern with extremely high profits in a base period will pay little or no excess-profits tax, assuming that the two concerns are of like size and make the same amount of money a year during the operation of the excess-profits tax. This basic criticism cannot be brushed aside on the theory that there will always be inequities and injustices. This is the general rule, not the exception. It was disappointing that the Treasury with its huge staff and its years of experience in administering tax laws did not come up with a better formula and did not make themselves more helpful to the committee.

It has been said that this bill carries a so-called growth formula whereby a young small company beginning to grow, as the result of good management and the soundness of their production, would not be declared to be earning wartime excess profits and their growth prevented. Such a thing is bad for our economy. It is bad for the consumer because in the last analysis the consumer pays a good share of all taxes. Whenever a very small concern succeeds in becoming a middle-sized concern, the increased competition provides a better product of lower cost to the public and keeps our economy alive and productive. This makes us strong in peace as well as in war. Whenever a middle-sized concern for meritorious reasons grows into a larger one, the public likewise benefits for the same reason. Shall we consider all normal growth as wartime excessive profits?

To deny small concerns the right to grow entrenches the large monopolistic concerns. It gives the concern that is already large a free field. It lessens their competition and the public pays.

The weakness of the growth formula attempted in this bill goes back to the weakness of attempting to reach excess profits by starting out with a base period. The company that can show a growth in the base period may get some benefits from this. The small company that has potentialities for growth but that growth is not shown in the base period will not receive much help.

In connection with growth companies, certain of them will under the right set of circumstances be permitted to take the average earnings of their particular industry as the base from which they might figure their excess-profits tax. Certainly the concern whose earnings are less than average is not having earnings that are excessive. This principle should be applied to all the taxpayers coming under the excess-profits-tax law. It would simplify the procedure, make the administration less costly and go a long way in relieving some of the hardship cases. If our objective is to eliminate unreasonable and excessive wartime profits, our bill should be confined to that regardless of how much revenue it raises. It follows that other taxes will likewise have to be raised. The big job ahead is going to be so costly that if we maintain a pay-as-you-go system, all taxes will have to be increased.

The theory of this bill before us is that the company shall take the average of their profits of any 3 years from 1946 to 1949, inclusive, and that 85 percent of this average is their excessive profits tax credit. As it is determined what the profits of a company are, this excess-profits-tax credit is subtracted and a tax rate of 75 percent is applied to the so-called excess. Or, a concern may ascertain the amount of their invested capital and apply a percentage rate set forth in the bill to determine what their excess-profits-tax credit is in that manner. As stated previously, if the excess-profits-tax credit is high, the tax to be paid is low. This rewards the concern whose past profits have been very high. It punishes the concern which for some good reason has had abnormally low profits during the so-called base period.

For instance, if a country bank whose average profits during 3 of the 4 years of the base period is $40,000, their excess-profits-tax credit under this bill would be 85 percent of that, or $34,000. If next year they make $38,000, even though their earnings are $2,000 below normal or average, they will have $3,000 excess-profits tax to pay. It may be necessary to raise the taxes of this corporation even though their earnings are not up to average. We should not call it excess, however. It should be a simple raise in the surtax rates and apply it to all corporations alike. In order to determine the true excess-profits tax that is earned, 100 percent of the average should be taken, not 85 percent. This may not bring in quite as much revenue, but that additional revenue can be reached by an across-the-board raise of the regular corporation taxes. It is my belief that the Congress should give special attention to those very small concerns that are making a struggling start. I refer to that small corporation that is not really any larger than a small partnership or an individually owned enterprise. It may consist of a man with a good idea, integrity, a lot of ambition, and a mere handful of employees. Such a concern is entitled to more consideration than the great monopolistic concerns of our country. It is from these small beginnings that we get our industrial progress. The growth of these small concerns means more competition, better products at lower cost, as well as more jobs and more revenue for the Federal Treasury. In the World War II act, there was a $10,000 exemption over the excess-profits-tax credit before applying the tax. Such an exemption would not mean anything taxwise to the huge far-reaching corporations of the country. It would mean a great deal to the little, new concern that I just mentioned. Such an exemption should have been placed in this bill. I offered a motion in the committee for such an exemption, but I regret to report that it was voted down by a vote of 15 to 10.

The experience of an excess-profits tax in World War II was not very satisfactory. While it raised quite a little money, its application to the various businesses of the country was not uniform and was not equitable. The industry of no State in the Union received harsher treatment under the World War II excess-profits law than did the industry of my own State of Nebraska.

The World War II excess-profits tax had as its base period the average income from 1936 to 1939. That law, too, had an alternative of computing the base upon the capital investment. That approach was not practical for a great many corporations; 1936 to 1939 were drought years in Nebraska. Consequently, the average income of business concerns in that period was very low. It was abnormal, yet the law said that this is the normal period, and everything earned above that was excess profits. While my State was being penalized, high earning corporations in other sections of the country were not paying their share.

In the World War II act there was sort of a catch-all relief section. This section delegated authority for the adjustment of hardship cases. It has been referred to as section 722. It has cost the taxpayers millions and millions of dollars to administer section 722. It has cost industry millions and millions of dollars to present their cases under section 722. Countless thousands of meritorious hardship cases were denied. Thousands of cases are still pending. They are still a drain on the Federal Treasury. One witness testified that his concern in presenting their 722 case, assigned 40 men for a year to prepare the claim. Small business just cannot do that. Small business, by and large, has received no help under section 722 of the old law. Rather than to hire accountants, statisticians, and lawyers for months and years to prepare their claim, the average small concern throws up their hands and says, "What's the use?" They suffer the injustice. These section 722 cases should be cleaned up. Under that law the taxpayer was denied the right to appeal in section 722 cases to any court other than the Tax Court. Were these taxpayers to appeal a few of these cases it would clear up the situation. It would mean a quicker ending of these controversies. It would relieve needed personnel in the Treasury Department for other duties. In the committee I offered an amendment to the present bill which would have permitted an appeal in section 722 cases, as is allowed in other tax cases. Unfortunately it was voted down by a vote of 15 to 10. I feel that this Congress will not have discharged its public duty properly until steps are taken to expedite the handling of these 722 cases in a manner that is fair to the taxpayer and fair to the Federal Treasury.

Another weakness of this pattern for an excess-profits tax law is that it is inflationary. Suppose the union leaders and management are gathered around the table in a wage dispute in connection with a concern paying the excess-profits tax. If the union leaders can say to management, "Why should you resist our demand for a raise—the Federal Treasury will pay three-fourths of this entire bill anyway," the judgment and the resistance of management is bound to be influenced thereby. The result is the spiral of high prices is given a boost, the consumers pay more, and even the increased wages buy less. These influences in our economy are extremely hard on the people living on a fixed income, whether it be a small amount of savings, a fixed salary, a pension check, an old-age-assistance check, or any other individual whose income is small. Some of the people shouting the loudest for this particular type of excess-profits tax law are motivated by their own selfishness and greed and are totally disregarding the rights and the needs of the consumers of the country.

This bill has many shortcomings when it is viewed in the light of our national defense. The most eminent authority that I know of concerning the impact of this bill on our defense is the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN], a member of our committee. I hope that due attention will be given to what he has to say in regard to this bill and that his suggestions can be followed. If we are to err, let us err on the side of the defense of America.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that before this bill becomes a law some drastic changes can be made in it.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. FORD. I am still not entirely clear as to the difference between a specific exemption and a minimum credit. To simplify your explanation, assume that this bill has a $10,000 specific minimum credit similar to what existed in the World War II act. Will the gentleman state the practical effect of the language now used?

Mr. CURTIS. Under the old law, the concern determined what their base, or, as they called it, what the income-tax credit was. Then they added a $10,000 exemption before they applied the tax.

Mr. FORD. Before they applied the 85 percent?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; the excess-profits tax. In this bill no specific exemption is given. They have a minimum excess-profits-tax credit of $25,000, which helps the corporation which makes no more than $25,000, and those only. A corporation making $15,000 can make up to $25,000 before they pay the tax. The corporation making $2,000 can make up to $25,000 before they pay this excess-profits tax. But it does nothing for the corporation that makes $26,000. It does nothing for the corporation which makes $30,000 or $40,000 or $50,000. So, with the exception of corporations that make less than $25,000, there is no exemption in this bill from the excess-profits-tax law, and there should be.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] be given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, if political panic grips the Congress, to whom shall the people turn in these grave days when the fate of the world hangs precariously in the balance? Judgment, reason, and calm must be our guiding principles.

Unfortunately, the bill before the Congress today is not the result of the calm consideration and judgment of the great and distinguished Committee on Ways and Means. It is the result of emotional hysteria. It is not a sound excess-profits-tax bill; it is an excess politics bill.

I am sure every Member of this House is united in the threefold common objective of taking the profits out of war, raising additional revenue, and stemming the rising tide of inflation. The issue before us today is not whether or not to pass legislation to achieve these objectives—the issue is rather what kind of legislation will most effectively achieve these ends. One thing, and one thing only, is certain—production and more production is the greatest weapon against inflation and is indeed the key to our survival. It would be calamitous if in a moment of hysterical panic the Congress should erect a tax barrier around the expansion of our industrial economy. We must have tanks, guns, and airplanes, and we must have them quickly. This will mean that the capacity of our defense industries must be expanded, new and growing enterprises capable of producing war matériel must be encouraged, and funds must be available for research and development.

Viewed with these objectives in mind H. R. 9827 is seriously defective. But how could it be otherwise for haste was the password, haste was the policy—haste at any price—and the net result is that the bill H. R. 9827, perhaps the most signal revenue bill ever to come before the committee, was never even read or analyzed by the committee. We are not legislating for this year or next year. We are probably legislating for many years to come.

Do you wonder, Mr. Chairman, why we Republicans have raised our voices against the perfunctory treatment given this legislation?

Do you wonder, Mr. Chairman, why we protest with all the vigor at our command against the delegation to the executive branch of the constitutional right of the Congress to write tax legislation?

In my opinion the most basic defect of H. R. 9827 is that it is dishonest. It is dishonest because it in effect taxes both normal profits and excess profits under the excess-profits machinery. This is done by arbitrarily reducing the excess-profits credit based on income from 100 to 85 percent. If we assume, as the bill does, that the earnings of the period 1946–49 are the yardstick for normal profits, then why should the credit for normal profits be reduced? The only justification is that by reducing the credit more revenue will be gained. But if normal profits are to be taxed, as is done under this bill, then why not be honest about it and spread the increased tax burden more equitably? Why should all the inequities and discriminations inherent in any type of a tax which attempts to set an arbitrary amount as normal be confined to what might more fairly be described as war profits?

Another serious defect of the bill is the inadequacy of the relief provisions, particularly for new and growing companies or for companies which have new products or services in the base period. There is absolutely no reason why the alternate method for computing average base-period income based on growth should be limited only to taxpayers which were in business during the entire base period and whose total assets as of the beginning of the base period did not exceed $20,000,000. The $20,000,000 figure was never analyzed by the committee, and it is obvious that it will work serious discriminations among many corporate taxpayers. Moreover, it is far from clear just what the total assets for this purpose consist of although it appears that they will be limited to the sum of cash and property other than cash used in the taxpayer's business.

In attempting to provide automatic formulas for each of the most important types of cases which arose under section 722 of the old law H. R. 9827 creates almost as many new problems as the problems which it attempts to solve. Not only is the restriction of the $20,000,000 total assets in the beginning of the base period inadequate for growing corporations, but the relief provided for corporations which added new products or services in the base period is inadequate. In general H. R. 9827 provides that a corporation which makes a substantial change in its business by introducing a new product or service before the end of the base period may use as an alternative credit a rate equal to the average of its industry. It is proposed that the figures used for the industry's average will be in accord with the classification used by the Treasury Department in compiling published statistics from corporation income-tax returns. These will be unsatisfactory at best and it should be pointed out that the figures are not now available and will not be finally available until sometime in 1952.

The relief intended as the substitute for section 722 (b) (4) of the World War II law is defective in several respects. In the first place the relief is available only if the following two tests are met: First, the new product or service produces more than one-third of the taxpayer's net income by the end of the third year following the year the product or service was introduced; and, second, the taxpayer's net income for any one of the first 3 years in which it meets the qualification described above is more than 25 percent greater than the taxpayer's average net income for the base period year or years preceding the year of change to the new product or service. The requirement that net income from the new product exceed one-third of total net income within 3 years after the end of the base period would virtually exclude all existing manufacturers of multiple lines of products. For example, a pharmaceutical company may regularly sell several hundred different types of drugs. It may introduce a new biotic with substantial earnings capacity but it can hardly be expected that for such a manufacturer any single new product will ever account for more than one-third of total profits. The same would be true in the case of household appliance manufacturers, chemical companies, textile manufacturers, and others.

No recognition is given in H. R. 9827 to new production facilities, changes in method of operations, or new management. The formula would be of no value whatever to manufacturers of standard parts whose business increases substantially as a result of new end products introduced by their customers.

No provision is made for a company in an industry which itself was new and in which no members had a normal rate of return. This is again particularly true, for example, of the television industry which was heavily engaged in research and development in the base period and did not begin to realize a satisfactory return until early 1950. Moreover, television manufacturing was not an industry during the base period and would undoubtedly be classified with many companies having radically different types of business and rates of return.

Inasmuch as the Democratic majority on the Committee on Ways and Means saw fit to report out H. R. 9827 with so many defects, it is now a most difficult problem to undo the damage. Certainly, however, as a bare minimum, special relief should be provided for the electronics industry, the aircraft-production industry, the precision-instruments industry, and other of our essential defense industries which suffered abnormalities in the base period and for which H. R. 9827 does not afford adequate relief. A considerable improvement can be made on H. R. 9827 by adoption of the Republican motion to recommit. The adoption of this motion will mean that the objectives of taking the profits out of war, raising additional revenue, and combating inflation will be better achieved by eliminating the 15-percent cut-back in the average earnings credit, and the application of the 75-percent special tax will be more nearly limited to direct war profits. And at the same time by increasing the surtax rate by 5 percentage points the additional revenue required to finance our accelerated defense program will be spread more equally among 300,000 corporations. The 100,000 corporations with taxable incomes of $25,000 and less will not be affected. In addition the inherently inflationary qualities of an excess-profits tax which establishes a high marginal rate will be reduced.

It is estimated that if the Republican motion to recommit is adopted, there will be an increase in revenue over H. R.

9827 by between $500,000,000 and $1,800,000,000.

Let those who are truly interested in the growth and expansion of our free competitive economy now stand up and be counted.

Let those who are truly interested in seeing that our boys in Korea get the guns, planes, and ammunition they need, stand up and be counted.

Let those who are truly interested in combating the silent thief of inflation which now stalks the country, stand up and be counted.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to use as the basis for my remarks the views of the minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means set forth on pages 76 to 81 of the committee report of the bill before us and the remarks made by my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. REED] on yesterday appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 16082. The first thing which might strike an unbiased person reading those minority views and the speech of yesterday is that the authors clearly made little contribution to the task before the committee. These statements of views are strong evidence of their effort to prevent rather than assist in the enactment of an excess-profits tax. The minority views criticize the majority for limiting consideration to an excess-profits tax, although they joined with their majority colleagues in the House in voting an overwhelming mandate in the Revenue Act of 1950 directing their committee and our committee to do this very thing and to do it during this session of the Congress.

I will yield now to any minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means who voted for the so-called Eberharter amendment when the matter was on the floor of the House during the consideration of the revenue bill of 1950, the section now known as section 701 of the act, to explain what happened between the time he voted for that direct mandate and the consideration of the bill by our committee which justifies a complete change in attitude regarding an excess-profits tax.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Could the gentleman explain to me why the Secretary of the Treasury insisted that this bill should not be called an excess-profits tax bill, but should be called a defense-tax bill?

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman cannot answer my question by proposing another one. Did the gentleman himself vote for this mandate in the revenue bill of 1950?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I voted, as did the gentleman and many other members of the committee, that the committee should study the proposition, yes; but I did not vote that we should bring back an unsound bill.

Mr. MILLS. We voted to have the committee report back to the House an excess-profits tax bill during the Eighty-first Congress, if the Congress was in session after November 15.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I just want to make this one comment that I think the gentleman is straining at the interpretation of section 701. I think that is a matter over which there can be a difference of opinion.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman mean to say that this is not an excess-profits-tax bill?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. No. I did not say that. If the gentleman does not want to yield me sufficient time to answer him, I will forget it.

Mr. MILLS. I am sorry. I apologize.

The minority views criticize the majority for limiting consideration of an excess-profits tax, although they joined with their majority colleagues in the House in voting a mandate in the revenue bill of 1950, directing their committee and our committee to do this very thing and to do it at this session of the Congress. Yet, what do we find the majority saying? I will not include my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], because he did not do that. He did not vote for it, but I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is the only member of the committee who did not vote for the mandate. Am I right or wrong?

Mr. MASON. I do not know about the others. All I know is about myself.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman did not vote for the Eberharter amendment.

Now, I quote from the minority report:

> Another most serious criticism of the approach of the majority in preparing this legislation was that at no time did the committee give consideration to the enactment of a renegotiation law similar to that which recaptured $6,000,000,000 of profits arising from World War II.

Is that the type of excess-profits tax that you meant the committee to report when you voted for that mandate in September of this year? Actually, all of us know that our committee has had under consideration amendments to the Renegotiation Act. I use the word "amendments," because we have a Renegotiation Act on the statute books now, a part of the appropriation bill of 1948. Of course, the act itself needs to be amended, and all of us know that one of the first things that will be done by the Eighty-second Congress is to amend and strengthen the Renegotiation Act. However, no one can seriously maintain that a contract renegotiation statute can replace or even greatly relieve the necessity for a tax on excess profits arising out of the defense program. Total appropriations for defense purposes in this fiscal year amount to about one-sixth of the estimated gross national product, and even smaller proportions of the gross national product will actually represent production in the performance of defense contracts. Five-sixths of the national product, therefore, will escape, if you have nothing more than a renegotiation law.

I think, from this sample of their views, it should be clear that the minority did not take seriously their commitment to have the Committee on Ways and Means report an excess-profits-tax bill at this section of the Congress. But I do want to assure you that the majority did take that commitment very seriously, and we told you that when the Revenue Act of 1950 passed. I know of no more convincing evidence of this than the great effort made by our chairman to see that our side, despite the opposition, did fully and truly perform its duty.

I do not propose today to tell you that every single provision in this bill has been perfected to a point where no improvement can be made. Everyone knows we were working under great pressure. The committee staff and others, after working for months in preparation for this bill, have been almost continuously at their posts night and day in recent weeks, since October 15, in order to see that all important matters were brought before the committee and that all essential information necessary to reach a reasonable conclusion was provided.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Does the gentleman intend to refer to me further in his remarks?

Mr. MILLS. Nothing more than this. I was in hopes you would ask me, but as I read your speech this morning in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wondered whether or not you were attempting yesterday to emulate that great prophet of old, Jeremiah, when he wrote the Lamentations.

Mr. REED of New York. If the gentleman so construes it, very well, but I think those people who understand taxation know exactly what I mean.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman has indicated that he does not understand anything about this bill. I am surprised. He has always seemed to me to be so intelligent. But the gentleman takes the Democratic members of the committee to task, he castigates us from the first line of his speech to the last line of his speech. I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman, that if he has an investigation sometime in the future to determine who wrote this bill that he enlarge the scope of the investigation to find out what happened to himself and the other members of his party on the Ways and Means Committee who changed their viewpoint completely from their vote in September to their vote when this bill was reported by the committee.

Mr. REED of New York. We never had a mandate to bring in here the type of bill that you brought in.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman misunderstood the whole thing, then.

Mr. REED of New York. I am sure the gentleman from Arkansas has.

Mr. MILLS. We will leave that decision to the House.

Mr. REED of New York. You will have a chance to.

Mr. MILLS. I am just disagreeing with the gentleman's expressed views, not with him, because I love the gentleman greatly.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman will have a chance to record himself a little later in the day.

Mr. MILLS. I feel that way, I may say to the gentleman. I like to think in the light of the depressing developments of the past few days that it is fortunate for our country that the Ways and Means Committee made this effort. We know that we face real problems and that it will take heroic work by our committee to keep up with the task of providing the billions of dollars additional revenue we may need over and above what will be obtained from the interim tax legislation passed this fall, and from this pending bill.

Aside from the castigation heaped by the minority in a general way, and by the speech of the gentleman from New York on yesterday in a very personal and specific way, aside from their general and largely obstructive criticisms, the minority raise six specific questions on the bill.

1. EIGHTY-FIVE PERCENT CUT-BACK OF BASE-PERIOD EARNINGS

As to their first objection, the minority report criticizes the provision of H. R. 9827 reducing the average earnings of the three best years in 1946–49 to 85 percent in computing the excess-profits credit. They assert that this represents a basic fallacy and defect, since it fails to limit the application of the 75-percent tax rate to excess profits alone. They apply some rather harsh language to this feature of the bill and ask the question, "Why, if the earnings of 1946–49 are normal, should they be reduced?" They answer that no justification has ever been made for such a reduction except on the grounds of revenue expediency.

Now I think that it should be made clear at the outset that there is nothing new in the bill in the cut-back of base-period earnings. Such a percentage reduction was made a part of the World War II law. Under the old law 95 percent of the average earnings was taken into account, and to my knowledge there has never been serious criticism of this feature. At that time it was recognized that companies who could use the base-period-earnings method had a substantial advantage over those whose credit was computed at the statutory rate on invested capital.

If a reduction to 95 percent was reasonable under the World War II tax, then an 85 percent adjustment is fully justified under the present circumstances. Corporate profits were higher in relation to invested capital or in relation to a number of other accepted standards in the 1946–49 period than they were during the base period selected for the World War II tax.

For business as a whole, earnings in 1946–49 averaged roughly 20 percent on invested capital as against 8 percent in the period 1936–39, or two and one-half times as high as in the old base period.

As the majority report points out, the period 1946–49 was one of unusual business prosperity. To a substantial degree it was built on deferred demand, accumulated liquid savings of World War II, and continued high levels of defense expenditures. Few qualified observers would contend that this unprecedented level of profitability could be expected to continue permanently. Therefore, full allowance of the base period earnings would generally produce on overstatement of normal earnings capacity in the absence of the additional stimulation produced by Korea and the defense program.

It may be granted that any specific figure used in scaling-down the general average earnings is, to some extent, arbitrary, but I submit that in the light of the fabulous earnings enjoyed by most firms and industries which will be subject to this tax, the 15-percent cutback is a moderate adjustment. I feel confident that there are very few corporate executives who would not be delighted to settle for a long-term earnings average comparable to 85 percent of what they have made in the best three recent years.

A further consideration is that, while the cutback contained in the bill is somewhat higher than was used in World War II, the proposed definition of average base-period earnings is more liberal. The right of the taxpayer to select his three best years confers an important advantage over the World War II law, which merely permitted him to substitute 75 percent of the average of the other 3 years for his worst year. In addition, the bill allows the taxpayer to treat any deficit in the 3 years as zero. The World War II law, by contrast, held the taxpayer strictly to account for his deficits so that they were taken as negatives in computing his average earnings. It is also notable that the bill, unlike the World War II tax, adjusts the base-period earnings credit upward for new capital additions from all sources in 1948 and 1949. Such adjustment is itself not subject to the cutback. These liberalizations alone go a long way toward offsetting the effect of the larger cutback.

The 15-percent cutback brings within the scope of the higher tax rate a higher portion of profits and a somewhat greater number of taxpayers than if there were no cutback. This is a more selective and, I believe, a fairer way of levying the additional burden so that it will not apply to firms whose earnings declined very substantially. In other words, I believe it is fairer to impose a special excess-profits tax using 85 percent of the base-period earnings as a starting point than to use some other method of getting the revenue at this time which would impose burdens on corporations who are experiencing difficulties in making adjustments to the defense economy.

Mind you, that is very important. A corporation must make at least 85 percent of its average in the base period, these three best years, before it is subjected to any excess-profits tax. If it makes less than 85 percent it pays only the normal tax. If you up the normal or surtax rate on all corporations, however, as I understand the motion to recommit would do, even the corporation that suffers a decline in profits will pay more tax as a result of that action.

2. H. R. 9827 IS UNDULY INFLATIONARY

According to the minority report, the bill is unduly inflationary.

This is the common argument on which many have pinned their hopes of defeating the bill. They alleged that with the 75-percent tax rate, business will go on an orgy of spending because the deduction of the expenditures from income would throw 75 percent of the cost onto the Government and leave only 25 percent to be borne by the taxpayer.

In attempting to make this point, the minority have set up a new concept of business judgment. They say, and I quote:

> It is not a question of inefficiency or efficiency of ways or prudence but simply a matter of practical business judgment.

This statement apparently excludes efficiency and prudence as being elements in practical business judgment. I have never yet met a businessman who was willing to throw away 33 cents. Most businessmen with whom I am acquainted are very prudent when it comes to counting the dollars that will be left over to them when they have reckoned both their income and their expenses.

However, I think there is a deeper implication to this allegation of waste. Anyone who makes this claim and subscribes to it is reflecting on the integrity and patriotism of the business community. I, for one, seriously doubt whether thoughtful members of the business community desire to convey the impression that such is the spirit in which they are willing to support the efforts of our Armed Forces and the sacrifices of the mass of the people being devoted to a cause in which business has so much at stake.

In considering this argument we should not be stampeded by comparisons which look only at part of the possible effects of different methods of taxing corporate profits. Wasteful use of resources may take many different forms. At a time when all of our industrial efficiency is needed we must look at this problem in the aggregate.

I think it can be said without contradiction that excessive profit-making opportunities which would draw resources from necessary production would be the most inexcusable waste of resources, yet such a development could result from uncontrolled profits. Thus a special tax on defense profits may be expected to prevent unessential expansion in some segments of the economy which would compete with disastrous consequences for the more essential requirements of our limited resources.

The special taxation of defense profits also avoids another form of waste which heavier general increases in the corporation income tax might produce. The exemption of normal profits provided by the credit under the excess-profits tax gives assurance that corporations having difficulty making adjustments under the defense program will not be unduly burdened. If their general tax load were increased, these concerns might be forced to make uneconomic and disorderly financial adjustments before they can find their appropriate place in the new scheme of things. More economy may be obtained in the use of resources by preserving existing business talents than following the expensive route of building up new talents.

In this whole subject we should not lose sight of the forest for the trees. The inflation problem is a broad one. It must be attacked on all possible fronts. We must expect at some stage more direct controls on inflation. Even before that time, we want voluntary restraint on the part of labor and other groups. If we are to expect other groups to accept these controls we must at the same time be able to show them in all fairness that a comparable restraint has been placed upon corporate profits.

I want to interpose just a moment. Since my friend from New York is back, I recall earlier this year, during the consideration of the revenue bill of 1950, that he and I had quite an exchange on the floor. I argued at the time that corporate management could not pass on as a cost of doing business taxes paid to the Federal Government through normal and surtax. My friend from New York took the other position when we were suggesting an increase in normal and surtax in connection with the revenue bill of 1950 and said that when we did that all in the world we were doing was adding to the cost of the goods, thereby creating more inflation in the United States.

Everybody I have talked to in business, almost without exception, takes a different view from that which I took. They say that in conditions such as exist today the tax paid the Federal Government on income can be calculated as a cost of doing business, at least in part, and under some circumstances all of it. Thus, the price of the article manufactured or sold can be increased to take care of that cost.

I leave it to the fair judgment of all members of this committee on both sides as to which could be more easily passed on, a flat increase in the normal and surtax applied to corporations or an excess-profits tax levied against anything they may make in excess of their normal and surtax credit. Is there any question about which is more inflationary? Yet, my friend from New York and those who follow him on the Committee on Ways and Means have gone into great length in their effort to make us believe that an excess-profits tax is inflationary, and they offer as a substitute the very thing which, according to their statements earlier in the year, would be much more inflationary.

I know what he means. He means that, if you propose to tax business at the rate of 75 percent on that which it may make in addition to what it has made in the base period, business will not expand, we will not get the production we need from that business segment. Here again I disagree with the thought expressed in condemnation of my business friends. Does that mean they themselves are so unpatriotic that in an hour of need and great emergency, in time of war, they would back off and withhold those resources that we need in this era of mechanization until such time as the Congress or the people of the United States may permit them to make excessive and exorbitant profits on the sale of their products? I know of no business in World War II, and I challenge any Member of this House to point out one business, that failed to continue to operate and produce because of the excess-profits tax. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], and all those majority members of our committee who have spoken have pointed out in a very able manner that the bill before the House is not nearly so rigid or severe as the excess-profits tax of World War II.

Thus, does it not follow that under a less severe or rigid bill, needed production which we must have to supply the armed services of our country in this hour of our greatest trial will be available? There is more incentive today in the bill before the House for increased production in any line than there was in the World War II Excess Profits Tax Act.

I had intended to talk about growth, and the arguments made by the minority in the committee that our bill does not properly handle growth corporations. They point out some of the weaknesses of the growth formula. Let me hurriedly cover those.

They say there is a discrimination against diversified companies in our growth formula. May I ask this question of the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS]: Did I understand him on yesterday to make the statement, or was I incorrect in thinking he made the statement, that the Republican minority was taking credit for this growth formula in the bill?

Mr. JENKINS. I said that we were entitled to credit for it. I said we were entitled to credit for two or three other matters, and I also said I could cite five or six more things if I had the time.

Mr. MILLS. Then it would be proper for me to assume that the growth formula is very satisfactory? I am sure the minority would not offer an amendment if it was not satisfactory.

Mr. JENKINS. I would not go so far as to say that the formula was satisfactory. I would say that we encouraged it and also encouraged that differentiation be made with reference to these new and modern businesses that have grown up in the last year or two. Generally speaking I want to take credit now since you have asked me, and I want to say broadly to the whole world, that the bill as the majority wanted it is not to be compared to the bill as it now is. In other words, the bill now is 500 percent better than it was the way you other members of the committee would have had it.

Mr. MILLS. How does the gentleman know what I would have done? If the gentleman wants to create the impression that he had anything whatsoever to do with the growth formula which is in this bill, I want to serve notice right now I did not hear him say anything about it. Perhaps some other members of the minority did, but this is one provision which I thought we were all in agreement on. As I read the minority report you point out its weaknesses. Let us see if they are weaknesses.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he leaves that subject?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman, and I assure him I am not going to leave the subject.

Mr. MASON. If any Member of the House will read the hearings which were held, he will find that 90 percent of the questions bringing out the differences and the inequities which we could expect from an excess-profits tax were asked and discussed by the minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman want them to do that before the members of the committee read the bill? The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] suggested that none of us had read the bill. Do you want the membership of the House to read the hearings anyway?

Mr. MASON. I am not asking anyone to read them. I am just saying that the hearings justify the statement that the minority members did have the greatest part in bringing out the inequities and also in working out some kind of solution for them.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman means that he joined with us in doing that? Is that what the gentleman means, that he joined with the majority members in that respect?

Mr. MASON. Of course we had to join with the majority members if we wanted to get anything in the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I just want the RECORD to show that, may I say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], because I know he is interested in keeping the record straight.

Let us look into this question of the growth formula.

3. INADEQUATE RELIEF FOR GROWTH COMPANIES

The minority report states that the relief for growth companies is inadequate.

The growth formula in H. R. 9827 is designed to assure true growth companies that their credit will be based at least on the average income in 1948 and 1949, or on 1949 income alone, whichever is higher. This can afford a substantial advantage over other companies. In addition to this very liberal treatment, growth companies will be able to add to their credit 12 percent of any new capital added after 1949 and one-third of the interest paid on capital borrowed after 1949. These provisions, in general, will assure growth companies an adequate rate of return before the excess-profits tax is applied.

The relief for growth is not limited to the provisions above. Contrary to the impression given in the minority report, new companies in the early stage of development at the end of the base period may obtain a credit above their 1949 level of earnings. Where one-third of its profits is attributable to a new product or services introduced in the base period, a corporation may obtain an alternative credit based on the industry rate of return in the base period.

The minority report cites the following situations to support its contentions:

(a) Discrimination against diversified companies: The report cites the example of a pharmaceutical company that introduces a new biotic, which does not account for more than one-third of total profits. It is implied that such companies should be given additional relief. Actually, introduction of new biotics in the chemical industry is normal and is already allowed for in the computation of the base-period earnings credit. In the other industries mentioned—household appliance manufacturers and textiles—actual earnings experience in the base period was high for most companies. In any event, as to such corporations, the introduction of a new product which really represents an expansion of the business is likely to be reflected in the additional credit for new capital during and subsequent to the base period.

(b) It fails to recognize factors other than new products and services: The minority report states in this connection that manufacturers of standard parts whose business increases substantially as a result of new end products introduced by their customers should also be given relief. In other words, the minority contends that excess profits earned by any company because of new products produced by others should be given relief. For example, the minority would grant additional relief to a company which manufactured more spark plugs because a new tank is designed for the defense program.

(c) Discrimination against new and growing companies: The minority report states that no provision is made for a company which itself was new and operating in a new industry with a low rate of return. They cite television as an example. The minority argument ignores the fact that the industry classifications are broad. This has the advantage that new industries are given a rate of return based not only on their own industry but also on rates in well-established businesses in the same general classification.

(d) Administrative difficulties: The minority report states that the benefit of section 443 of the bill relating to new businesses or old businesses introducing new products may not be availed of by a taxpayer when filing his return but must be claimed in a separate application for relief. However, the minority states in parentheses that the exception to this rule is provided in section 430 (d). Section 430 (d) actually permits all companies granted relief under section 443 to defer 80 percent or more of the reduction in tax claimed because of the relief granted to new companies or new products. This 80-percent deferment corresponds with a deferment of only one-third of the tax for such companies during World War II.

The minority also states in this connection that the possibility of dispute with regard to the provisions of section 443 exists for a number of technical reasons. Actually, however, the concept of what constitutes a change in product or services was developed under the prior excess-profits-tax law, and experience thereunder was generally satisfactory. Thus, there is no reason to expect that the administration of section 443 will be fraught with unusual difficulties. The section will apply automatically in most cases and will therefore eliminate a great deal of administrative work which this type of situation formerly required.

(e) Credit is in inverse proportion to rate of growth: The minority state that the faster the rate of growth the earlier in the development period will be the determination of the credit. This statement appears to be made as a criticism of the provision relating to the growth formula and the relief applicable to new companies and new products. Actually, however, where the rate of growth is fast in the early part of the development of the business and then slackens off, the credit should be determined on the basis of the early experience. Consequently the provision in the bill conforms with the objectives of the committee in such cases. Under the present situation, with war-stimulated business, allowance for growth beyond the limits set by the committee would be likely to give an additional credit merely for defense-induced profits.

4. H. R. 9827 AND THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

Aircraft industry: The minority report states that vital information promised to the committee by the Treasury Department during the public hearings in regard to the aircraft industry was never furnished to the committee. The Treasury Department provided the committee with an analysis of the data for 15 of the largest aircraft manufacturers, which constitute most of the industry. In addition, at the request of one of the signatories of the minority report, a special table was prepared summarizing the information presented at the executive session. Throughout the executive session the staff of the Treasury Department was very helpful to the committee and worked night and day to provide them with the necessary information. In view of the record, it is unfair to make this accusation.

The minority report states that no special provisions were designed to cushion the injurious effects of the excess-profits tax on the aircraft industry. This statement is also incorrect. Many of the liberalized features of the proposed tax which are described in detail in the report on the bill were designed with the aircraft industry in mind. The following is a summary of the liberalized features of the bill which will be particularly helpful to the aircraft industry.

(a) The earnings credit would be computed on the basis of the three best years of the 1946–49 period and if other deficit years remain, such years will be counted as zero in the computation of base-period earnings. This provision was intended to be of assistance to such industries as aircraft where the majority of companies had more than one deficit in the base period.

(b) For purposes of computing the invested capital credit, companies will be allowed to add back the amount of net deficits incurred in the base period. This feature would be of particular importance to the aircraft companies in view of their deficit experience since 1945.

(c) In the case of new capital, including retained earnings, a rate of return of 12 percent would be allowed in computing base-period credit or invested-capital credit. In the case of borrowed capital, adjustment for credit would be one-third of the interest paid, not to exceed 3 percent of the amount borrowed. This provision will be of special importance to growing firms in the aircraft industry.

It is well to recall in this connection that much of the increased profits resulting directly from the defense program will accrue to the benefit of the aircraft industry. Adequate provision has already been made to protect this industry. Further liberalization of the provisions of the excess-profits tax for this industry might wipe out the excess-profits tax in an area where it is probably most justified.

5. STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

It is the view of the minority that H. R. 9827 does not go far enough in extending special consideration to the mining industry insofar as strategic and critical minerals are concerned. Specifically, they suggest that section 451, relating to exemption of the increased output of mines, be broadened to grant additional tax relief to mining industries.

We are all aware of the need of securing adequate supplies of basic materials to meet the emergency demands of the economy. Our tax laws must be carefully drawn so that they do not discourage the utmost production of necessary materials. It is also important that special forms of tax relief intended to foster production be carefully designed to serve their purposes without creating serious revenue losses and inequities through broad and unjustifiable exemptions. To this end H. R. 9827 contains several specific relief provisions for the mineral industries which will remove tax deterrents to production and will foster output of strategic minerals.

The complete exemption of income derived from mining specified strategic minerals has been carried over from the World War II law and to the 14 minerals formerly exempt have been added by committee amendment 10 others, including uranium, which have been suggested for inclusion by the defense production authorities. The amendment also provides that the complete exemption be extended to any other minerals which are judged by the defense authorities to deserve such treatment.

Under the bill, as during World War II, income derived from the accelerated output of minerals is wholly or partially exempt from the excess-profits tax, to the extent this production is exhausting the taxpayers' known mineral reserves. For most minerals this exemption is graduated from 20 percent upward to 100 percent, according to the rapidity with which existing reserves are being depleted. In the case of coal and iron mines, timber properties and natural-gas properties, the exemption is one-half of the income from output in excess of base-period output.

The bill also contains the World War II provision exempting income derived from Government bonuses which were paid for output in excess of specified quotas. While no bonus program is in effect at present, the exemption will be available in the event production authorities should decide that such a program is needed.

These special measures are in addition to the generally liberal provisions of the bill and the minimum credit which exempts small mining corporations. Finally we should not forget the fact that mineral producers receive preferential treatment through allowances of percentage depletion, which serve to reduce both excess-profits-tax and income-tax liabilities.

6. REGULATED PUBLIC UTILITIES

It is charged that the alternative credit permitted public utilities, equal to a stipulated return on their capital after income tax, will work extreme hardship on many companies because the invested-capital base may be less than that employed for rate-making purposes. It is true, of course, that the adjusted basis of assets for tax purposes may differ from their valuation used by regulatory authorities. It is equally true that the taxable income of utilities differs from that determined for rate-making purposes. It is necessary to look at both the valuation of assets and the determination of income. Income for Federal tax purposes may be substantially lower than for rate-making purposes because of higher allowances for depreciation.

While the committee agreed to provide a minimum return for public utilities before they were subject to excess-profits tax, this determination of taxability could not be left to the practices of the many regulatory authorities in the country. Allowances for working capital, valuation of property, depreciation, interest charge to construction, as well as the fair rate of return itself, all vary among the States. The necessity of being guided by these varying practices called for by the minority report would be a dangerous precedent to establish for Federal tax purposes. In fact, serious doubts have been raised about injecting into the excess-profits-tax law the principle of guaranteeing any corporation a minimum tax-free return on investment before being subject to income tax.

You can readily see how tax administration would be complicated if it were necessary to use one set of determinations for income-tax purposes and another for the excess-profits tax. One of the important improvements in the committee bill is the provision for integrating the income and excess-profits taxes so that administration would be simplified.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that the membership will accept this effort on the part of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, and those minority members who voted for the bill when it was reported, as a genuine and sincere effort to do that thing which you told us last September to do. We came back in November, immediately following the general election, when other Members did not have to come back until November 27. We worked hard on this job. We have worked sincerely trying to make it a better bill than the one we had after World War II, one against which less justified criticism could be raised. We think we have done that. We think that what we bring you today, if you still desire an excess-profits-tax law, as you indicated in September, is worthy of your acceptance as what you told us then you wanted us to bring to you.

I trust that, if there is a motion to recommit, the motion will be defeated, and that this bill will immediately be sent on to the other body, so that immediate work may be initiated over there, and that we may have a bill before the Christmas holidays that we can send to the President.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, when millions of young men must interrupt their careers and risk their lives in the cause of national defense, those who stay at home should be willing to serve the cause of national defense without being allowed to enrich themselves by the abnormal wartime price structure. Furthermore, the Government needs increased revenues to prosecute the war most effectively, and it is both necessary and fair to tax increased earnings attributable to the national emergency. On the other hand, it is highly important that the tax program of the Government not kill incentive to produce the essential materials and equipment at the very time they are most needed.

The provisions in H. R. 9827 for taking 3 out of 4 years of the base period to determine the base period credit is fair enough, but the provision in this bill to tax all earnings in excess of 85 percent of the base-period credit so determined is exceedingly unfair to those industries that experienced low earnings during the base period. In effect this provision places those corportions in a strait-jacket and threatens to kill incentive for their expansion. Unfortunately for America today, many industries that are vital to our successful prosecution of the war experienced low earnings during the base period and now face being placed in this strait-jacket at the very time we need them most.

Therefore, while I favor the imposition of a tax on excess corporate profits arising from the war economy, I cannot support any part of such a tax program that may kill incentive in those industries that determine the success of or failure of our war effort. I kept that qualification uppermost in my mind throughout the hearings and the executive sessions of the Committee on Ways and Means, because I have given most of my lifetime to the study of national defense. That is why I advocated special consideration for transportation, communications, and other utilities, and special consideration for aircraft production and the production of strategic and critical materials by our domestic mining industry.

In the hope that I can be helpful in securing a better understanding of the impact of this proposed legislation on some of the vital national defense industries, and especially in the hope that my discussion may be helpful to the Senate Committee on Finance in their consideration of amendments which cannot be presented to the House of Representatives under the closed rule that governs our proceedings on this bill, I will proceed to discuss my objections to the bill in the field of national defense.

While I commend the committee on the action they have taken in this legislation with respect to certain transportation and communication industries and to utilities generally, I am alarmed over their failure in this bill to extend proper and needed consideration to the airline industry and the aircraft production industry, and to the domestic mining industry.

The committee has extended some badly needed relief to the mining industry in the form of a committee amendment that will be presented to section 448 of the bill, H. R. 9827, now under consideration, but I am seriously disappointed in the refusal of the committee to adopt a more liberal treatment of the mining industry in section 451 of the bill. That section is identical to section 735 of the World War II excess-profits-tax law, and the mining industry presented a very effective appeal for liberalizing some provisions of that section based on their experience with this law during World War II. This section should be continued, but Congress can provide greater incentive to the mining industry by eliminating all reference to "estimated recoverable units," or any reductions or exclusions based on the ratio of current output to the estimated recoverable units remaining in the property. Such reductions or limitations are directly contrary to the principle that the normal profit per unit should not be subjected to a tax on excess profits.

Let us examine the position of the administration in regard to the mining industry.

On page 81 of the hearings you will find a colloquy between Secretary of the Treasury Snyder and myself, as follows:

Mr. MARTIN. Then there is another very important question. I have not seen in your statement any reference at all regarding the exemption to strategic and critical materials, particularly minerals. Do you have any provision in mind for that?

Secretary SNYDER. That is a part of our continuing study and we will try to have something ready for you during the course of your deliberations.

Mr. MARTIN. It is your idea that we should?

Secretary SNYDER. Some consideration should be given to it.

Mr. MARTIN. That we should include that in our study?

Secretary SNYDER. You are thinking in terms of stimulating production?

Mr. MARTIN. Absolutely.

Secretary SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. Domestic production?

Secretary SNYDER. I understand.

Throughout the balance of the hearings and during the executive sessions and study by the Committee on Ways and Means, I waited in vain for the submission of any proposals by the Secretary to stimulate domestic mine production through extending special consideration to them in this legislation. In fact, the committee approved the amendment to section 448 of the bill in the face of vigorous opposition by Treasury staff members who sat in committee meetings throughout the executive sessions.

Just today my attention has been called to the statement of Secretary Snyder before the Senate Committee on Finance yesterday in which he made the following statement:

Another provision of the bill, section 448, would greatly enlarge the area of preferential treatment in the mining industry. I am fully aware of the importance of securing strategic minerals. However, it will require great care to formulate legislation in the interest of defense production without granting unjustified benefits or encouraging unproductive diversion of essential resources. When this matter receives your consideration, the staff will be prepared to place the pertinent facts before you.

The inaction of the Treasury staff in bringing to the Committee on Ways and Means any suggestions for amendment or improvement of the provisions of the World War II excess-profits-tax legislation together with their vigorous opposition to the amendment approved by the committee that will be introduced as a committee amendment led me to believe that Secretary Snyder's efforts before the Senate Committee on Finance will be entirely negative in spite of the failure of the World War II excess-profits-tax legislation to stimulate and encourage production of strategic and critical materials.

The number of mines producing gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc in this country was reduced from 11,033 in 1935 to 2,308 in 1949. I do not have at hand the number of mines producing other minerals, but I know that a great many mines of all kinds have closed during the past 15 years. Furthermore, industrial stockpiles of strategic and critical materials are today at a dangerously low level. Any industrialist in America will attest that fact, and almost every Government official who has had jurisdiction in this field will do likewise. Still further, the Government's stockpile that should have reached 80 percent of the 5-year program established by Congress in 1946 stood on June 30 of this year at 38.4 percent. But probably the most vital reason for keeping all of our domestic underground mines in operation is to retain, and, if possible, increase, the present supply of mine labor. Experience during World War II proved that the supply of this labor cannot be increased after war has commenced. In fact, the reverse was true, and, due to the loss of mine labor as the war progressed, domestic copper production dropped 44 percent from 1942 to 1946, lead production dropped 32 percent, and zinc production dropped 25 percent during the same period. From the end of World War II until March of this year, three-fourths of all the strategic and critical materials purchased for the stockpile were purchased in foreign countries. I am sorry I do not have at this time figures for the last 9 months.

The President's request of December 1 for additional appropriations for the Department of Defense will bring the total for the United States military forces for the current fiscal year to $41,800,000,000 and for the Atomic Energy Commission an additional $1,050,000,000. In a program of this magnitude, the production of needed equipment will tax our meager supplies of strategic and critical materials to the utmost. The chairman of the Munitions Board last May told 300 business leaders in Pittsburgh that the Army, Navy, and Air Force would place orders for $41,000,000,000 of war materials in the first 6 months of an emergency, but placing the orders and getting production are two vastly different things. Those orders will stay in the category of orders only, unless we have the strategic and critical materials needed for actual production.

I have here available for your inspection 30 different official regulations and orders issued during the past 8 weeks by the National Production Authority that furnish us with strong proof of the extreme scarcity of materials needed in our preparedness program.

Clearly this is no time for the tax-writing committees and for Congress inadvertently to place the mining industry in the strait-jacket of World War II excess-profits-tax legislation when the record made in World War II shows that that legislation might delay and even defeat our entire national defense effort. Do we need to wait longer for Secretary Snyder to study the impact of the World War II excess profits tax legislation on the mining industry?

The effect which the bill would have on the airline industry is, in my opinion, another serious blow to an industry extremely vital to our national defense.

We all know the splendid role which the commercial airlines played in World War II, and the dependence which the military is placing on them in the event of another conflict. Prior to World War II, plans were carefully made for the utilization of the airlines in the case of a war. Not only were these plans carried out in full, but drastic additions were made when the critical needs for transport aircraft in that war became clear. In May of 1942 the Government requisitioned 168 aircraft which the airlines had on order, and took almost half of the aircraft then in operation. Approximately half of all of the airline executives, flight crews, and mechanics also entered military service.

The last war proved the value of air transport to the military. As a result, this Government has given almost constant attention since the end of World War II to the provision of air-transport capacity for military purposes, in the event of another similar emergency. In all of the studies a large portion of the commercial airline fleet has been regarded in effect as a part of the available military transport fleet.

I am informed that these studies have revealed that, notwithstanding the use of a portion of the commercial fleet, a serious deficiency in air-transport capacity is to be expected. It has been plain to the airlines that, in order to meet this national defense problem, they are required to develop their commercial business and the size of their fleets as rapidly as possible. They have made good progress in carrying out this responsibility, the fleet having increased since the end of World War II from about 350 twin-engine airplanes to over 1,000, almost half of which are four-engine transports. The airlines now have on order 164 aircraft, costing about $136,000,000. These aircraft will be put into service in the next 2 or 3 years.

The value of the airline fleet in times of emergency was again demonstrated last summer when it became necessary to provide fast transportation across the Pacific to Korea. The military requested, and promptly received, from the airlines 43 four-engine transports, with four crews for each airplane. This constituted about 10 percent of the airlines' four-engine fleet. While this operation did not drastically affect the maintenance of successful commercial service, a more extensive future operation of the same kind certainly would.

If you have listened to the radio in the last 30 minutes, you know that you may have need for some air transport in an awful hurry.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Is it not a fact that a large part of the civilian planes have already been requisitioned for this emergency in Korea?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. Yet this bill would work an injury to this very industry that we need.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. It is very hard on the airline industry.

By the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, the Congress created the Civil Aeronautics Board and made it the Federal agency responsible to see to it that the airline industry is economically sound, and developed as required to meet the present and future needs of the commerce of this country and of our national defense. The Board was directed by that act to take those needs into account in determining the mail compensation to be paid to the airlines. In the exercise of its expert judgment the Board has consistently held that a return of 10 percent on airline investment is essential to the maintenance of a sound industry.

The measure before us provides two bases upon which the taxpayer may determine the amount of excess profits tax he will pay. However, since the airline industry, according to the Treasury Department's own figures, suffered a loss during the years 1946 through 1949 it is unable to use the so-called average earnings method for determining its tax credit. The industry is compelled, therefore, to use the so-called invested capital credit. The bill before us would permit the industry a credit amounting to 5 percent of its investment after income taxes. Thus, the industry would be permitted to earn approximately 5 percent on its investment, and the remainder would be taxed at 75 percent as excessive earnings.

I have seen nothing in the record of the hearings on this bill, nor do I have any information from any source whatsoever, that the determination by the Civil Aeronautics Board of the earnings which the airlines should be permitted, is in error. As a matter of fact, I believe that the Board's determination is correct. That being the case, it is on the face of it, unwise, and even dangerous from the viewpoint of our defense effort, to cut substantially in half the amount of earnings which the Civil Aeronautics Board has determined that the industry must have in order to maintain its proper growth. If for no other reason than the effect of this bill on the airline industry, I believe that it should be reviewed and revised by the Congress in the interest of national defense before it is finally enacted into law.

In this hour of greatest need for aircraft production you will find very little information regarding the impact of H. R. 9827 on the aircraft production industry in the hearings or in any other document available to Congress at this time and furnished by the Treasury. The Treasury staff did provide the Committee on Ways and Means with some information regarding the 15 aircraft manufacturers but that information was picked up within 10 minutes after it was placed before the committee because the Treasury staff did not want to reveal specific data regarding individual corporations. I therefore asked the Treasury officials to prepare a general statement by groups of corporations in this field showing the excess profits tax credit in a way that will be informative to Congress and yet not reveal information regarding specific aircraft manufacturers.

Why in Heaven's name the Treasury staff did not do that originally for our information and guidance I will never know.

The rate of return on net worth after taxes for all manufacturing was 12.8 percent in 1946, 15.6 percent in 1947, 16.1 percent in 1948, 11.7 percent in 1949, and 15.6 percent in the second quarter of 1950.

From the data furnished me by the Treasury officials it appears that if the excess profits tax credit for the 15 aircraft manufacturers is computed for the entire base period according to the base-period earnings method and invested capital method and the higher of the two is used the credit in terms of percent of net worth beyond which the aircraft manufacturers must pay so-called excess profits taxes stands at 4.7 percent for the lowest 5 aircraft manufacturers, 6.8 percent for the middle 5, and 10.7 percent for the highest 5 aircraft manufacturers. The over-all average credit as percent of net worth for the entire industry stands at 6.4 percent. This compares with the average of 15.3 percent for all manufacturing as indicated above.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman has made a very cogent statement. I think the Committee on Ways and Means and the House of Representatives should realize that right now, as the gentleman has said, and in the near future, the aviation industry will be called upon to expand its production from 5 to 25 times. That is a multiplication figure and not a percentage figure. Yet they are expected to take profits based on years when they were practically out of business.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I thank the gentleman very much. I know the younger Members of the Congress will be interested in knowing that the gentleman from California, Congressman HINSHAW, has given more time and more service to this field which I am now discussing than any man I have known in the Congress during my entire service here.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman is very kind, but I am hoping that we can point out to the committee and to the Government that they are going to expect these people to invest money in materials and wages to an extent far, far greater than their net worth, which means that they will have to go into the banks and to the Government to borrow a very great deal of money and they will be paid for their efforts at the same rates they were being paid during the years 1946 to 1949 when they were practically out of business.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell us what the aircraft industry must do in order to receive the money to be used as capital for the necessary expansion which must be made if we are to carry out our war effort as it should be carried out? Where will the money come from?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. If no provision is made, and no modification is made in the terms of this legislation the aircraft-manufacturing industry is up against a stone wall. I for one do not know where they can turn for enough funds to do the job asked of them. May I ask the gentleman if he has any suggestion to make?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. May I suggest that a final alternative for the aircraft industry is to appeal to the Government for funds and to borrow money from the Government and avoid the use of private capital which should take the risk and is eager to take the risk if it is a reasonable business risk, with prospects of a reasonable return.

In other words, the American way of carrying on our economy will be broken down and there will be substituted for our American economy Government investment in the industry upon which our defense depends.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. But even though that approach is finally resorted to, have we not delayed private industry in going ahead at this time and getting our aircraft which we need so seriously and so immediately?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. By our own deliberate act today in adopting this bill without some special provision, we are creating a situation whereby, by our own act, we are delaying the expansion of the aircraft industry.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Exactly. That is my chief criticism of the hasty, ill-considered, poorly studied approach to this particular problem in the field of national defense.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Yet the other side will take the floor and chide us because we wanted to bring in a bill in the interest of national defense.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Exactly.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I would like to point out, and I am sure the gentleman may in the course of his remarks do so, that nearly all of these defense contracts that are issued will very shortly be subject to an act that will be passed again by this Congress, known as the Contract Renegotiation Act.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. The Renegotiation Act attempts to compensate the manufacturers of defense materials in a reasonable and fair way. It has generally amounted to about 2 percent compensation for doing that job for the country. That is about the compensation that was awarded to the manufacturers of aircraft and engines during the last war. The renegotiated profits are even then subject to this tax, which means it does not make any difference whether you have renegotiation or not on those companies which are required to expand their production many times over. Let us take the case of the General Motors Corp. and the General Electric Corp., who are going to be and have been engaged in the manufacture of jet engines. The commercial profits have been so high in the last few years that it does not make any difference to them if they turn over to manufacturing jet engines, but if we expect Pratt-Whitney and Wright and some of the rest of them to go into the manufacture of jet engines, they will do it at a loss. This bill favors the big corporation and is detrimental to the small corporation that is required to expand for the national defense.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I thank the gentleman. That is the point I tried to bring before the Ways and Means Committee during the time we had this particular phase of the legislation under consideration in executive session. I only wish I had had the gentleman at my elbow at that moment, because I know he could have helped tremendously in avoiding this completely crippling type of legislation being brought to the Congress as it is now.

Mr. HINSHAW. I wish I could have been with the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. This bill, if enacted into law in its present form, will throw a wet blanket over the aircraft-production industry that will kill incentive to produce aircraft at the very time we need them most.

I condemn H. R. 9827 most emphatically because no provision is made to exempt the aircraft-production industry from the strait-jacket imposed by this legislation on industries that experienced low income during the base period.

The crisis confronting our Nation today calls for all-out aircraft production without delay.

Just 3 years ago both the Congress and the President were so alarmed over the plight of the aircraft industry following World War II that they undertook the most exhaustive study of the industry that we have ever known. The President appointed his Air Policy Commission and the Senate and the House by joint resolution established the Congressional Aviation Policy Board. Many Members of the present Congress served on this Board.

The reports of both of these bodies warned against tampering with the financial stability of one of the most important bulwarks of our national defense—the aircraft-manufacturing industry—and yet when we need it most this bill has disregarded the findings and the warnings of these studies of just 3 years ago, and not only has failed to protect the aircraft industry but actually has discriminated against it simply to report out a bill within the prescribed timetable.

I am sure these effects are not realized by those who approved the majority report but if this bill is not amended to redress a great wrong, then we will have failed, in the very first test of the present crisis, to build up the industry on which we have relied in the past and must rely now in the defense of the Nation.

During the years 1946 to 1949 the aircraft manufacturing industry suffered huge losses, as a result of the costs of reconversion, coupled with the industry's desperate efforts to survive through turning to commercial work when military business radically declined at the end of the war.

According to testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, one important aircraft company had a loss in a single year, before taxes, of over $25,000,000. Another company had a loss in each of the 4 years 1946 to 1949 of over $50,000,000. Fifteen leading aircraft manufacturers had an annual average loss before taxes in these 4 years of $1,200,000.

The bill before this House is based on the assumption that 1946 to 1949 was a period of unusual prosperity. But the aircraft industry during this period was suffering a serious depression.

The aircraft industry appeared before the Ways and Means Committee to explain its problems and made various proposals which would give it some relief. None of these proposals was included in the pending bill.

It is unnecessary to labor the point further that a strong aircraft industry is vital to our survival. But to be strong, that industry must have adequate profits after taxes to finance research, necessary plant improvement and development.

The aircraft industry is already faced with problems of the greatest difficulty. The advent of the jet engine with its tremendous increase in power availability has revolutionized almost overnight the construction of modern military aircraft. Present-day fighters go 700 miles per hour compared to 450 miles per hour in World War II. They operate at altitudes up to 50,000 feet instead of the former 20,000 to 25,000 feet.

These advances have confronted the industry with terrific problems in research and design. New production techniques are constantly required. To maintain leadership, however, the industry must have funds derived from profits after taxes to carry on these activities. A number of the leading companies right now have programs for essential plant improvement involving many millions of dollars, but their ability to carry out these programs is prejudiced by this bill.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman, for he is making a perfectly wonderful speech, but does the gentleman recall that Admiral Ramsey appeared before our committee and testified that Great Britain was far in advance of us in the development of the jet planes and speed planes?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Yes; our supremacy in that field is a matter of some considerable question because of some of the policies this Government has imposed on the industry.

Mr. REED of New York. And this bill will make it still worse.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Absolutely and seriously so.

The House bill gives no recognition to these facts nor to the postwar depression suffered by this industry. None of the relief requested by the aircraft industry was granted. The bill wholly ignores the aircraft industry which is so vital to our national defense.

Those who know and understand the problems involved in expanding the Air Force and Naval Aviation for war know that the controlling factor in the build-up of the Air Force and Naval Aviation is the supply of planes. Pilots could be trained, say the experts, faster than planes could be manufactured. That is why I placed so much emphasis upon the aircraft industry in my discussion with Secretary Snyder during the hearings.

Some of the vital information which was promised to the committee by the Secretary of the Treasury during the public hearings was never furnished. In the case of the aircraft production industry, for example, the colloquy between the Secretary of the Treasury and me was as follows:

Mr. MARTIN. I have a question or two here with reference to the national defense. I am particularly interested in a program that will avoid crippling essential defense industries. Do you have any suggestions for special relief in the case of the aircraft industry which suffered a loss in the period 1946–48?

Secretary SNYDER. That has been among our worst cases that we have had to consider and we think that special consideration must be given.

Mr. MARTIN. Have you any suggestions regarding that point? I have not found any in your statement.

Secretary SNYDER. We did not put that in here, because it is a matter that we will have to talk out with you as a special case.

Mr. MARTIN. It is very essential that we give that consideration, is it not?

Secretary SNYDER. There is no question about it. We are fully in accord with that.

But no special provisions designed to cushion the injurious effect of the Administration's proposals on this vital defense industry were ever proposed by the Treasury officials nor are any contained in H. R. 9827.

How long must we wait for Secretary Snyder and his staff to awaken to the possible disaster to America that lurks in the background of our exceedingly dangerous international situation that exists today?

The overzealous effort of the present national administration to apply iron-fisted and ill-fitted curbs on free enterprise regardless of the impact of those curbs on our national defense leads me to quote a paragraph from House Report 982, of the Seventy-seventh Congress, first session, submitted to Congress by a special investigating committee of he Committee on Military Affairs, July 21, 1941, as follows:

Emphasis over the past few years has been made on social reform rather than national security. As a nation we seem to have forgotten that without national security social reform might well prove meaningless.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I am very much interested in the comments of the gentleman about free enterprise and also his comment on the aircraft industry. The Senate Committee on Small War Plants Corporations points out that up to June 1945 the Federal Government spent $3,474,000,000 for facilities for the production of aircraft engines and parts. The industry itself spent in that period of time $317,000,000, or less than 10 percent of the money that the Government put in.

Under this bill if the deficits that the gentleman mentioned exist, and I am sure they do, under the deficit provision in this bill they can be considered and put in as a part of invested capital; but, as the gentleman from California expressed it a little while ago, if we increase our production from two- to five-fold——

Mr. HINSHAW. Five to twenty-five.

Mr. CARROLL. Obviously there is going to be no equity capital to give us that production and they will do as they did before: They will get the money from the Government and when they get that money, of course it will be subject to renegotiation. But under the 5-year amortization plan they will end up as they did before with the plant facilities.

It seems to me in this critical period certainly we need this industry, certainly we need their know-how, certainly we ought to do everything we can to stimulate production. However, I sincerely believe there is not anything in the provisions of this bill that would keep this great industry from producing as the gentleman from California has indicated.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Unfortunately there are. I described the strait-jacket as applied to this industry and I suggest the gentleman read and study my entire statement in the RECORD tomorrow.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Something like 1,575 war plants were built at Government expense during the last war. Of that number approximately 90 were sold at the end of the war. There still remain unsold and available to the Government some 1,485 such plants. Under this bill if an aircraft manufacturer is called upon to operate a Government plant, that is not his investment. That is a Government investment. He is not entitled under this bill to make earnings upon a Government investment.

Mr. CARROLL. May I suggest to the gentleman from California when he gets the loan from the Government that loan becomes a part of invested capital.

Mr. HINSHAW. Under this bill?

Mr. CARROLL. Under this bill; and moreover under the deficit provision he can include any loss as invested capital.

Mr. HINSHAW. I cannot find that in the bill. Certainly a Government-owned plant is not set up as a loan.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Will the gentleman explain how much of an allowance is made because of borrowed capital?

Mr. CARROLL. Of course, we discussed that in committee and I took the same view that the gentleman from Iowa took. I felt borrowed capital should be given the same treatment as equity capital. The committee established a different formula for it. They thought that formula was more equitable. What the exact formula is, we know they pay interest plus one-third. But it certainly would redound to the benefit of the industries.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I think the gentleman from California might have some observation along that line, as to whether that is an adequate margin.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is absolutely negligible and does not amount to anything.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I believe that they get this money, when they borrow it from the Government for defense purposes, they get it at something like 1½ or 2 percent. In other words, you are going to permit them to earn perhaps ½ of 1 percent of that money. What they have is a great management liability. I suppose there are very few people here who actually live in districts which manufacture aircraft, but I happen to know that at the conclusion of the last war the cash remaining available to aircraft companies was only sufficient to pay wages for about 3 days, and if the contract cancellations had not been tapered off to some degree, the companies would have gone broke just trying to close down their plants. Now, that is just one of those things that has to have special treatment, as Secretary Snyder admitted in his testimony before the committee. If you do not give that industry special treatment you will not have an aircraft manufacturing industry, and an aircraft manufacturing industry is absolutely essential to the success of any war effort, because if you cannot produce planes there is no use training men to fly them. The production industry is the most critical part of air warfare.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. The crux of the whole matter it seems to me is this: In World War II we put a strait-jacket on the aircraft industry and we, by that strait-jacket, forced them to go to the Government for 90 percent of the amount of borrowed capital that they had to have to expand. Now, do we want to repeat that performance or do we want to leave off the strait-jacket and let them do it in the American way, get adequate capital from private enterprise rather than driving them to the Government for this borrowed capital as they have done in England?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. That is one of the very real issues before us in this bill.

Mr. HINSHAW. I would like to point out in addition to my remarks to the gentleman from Colorado that where a Government plant is turned over to an aircraft manufacturer it does not become subject to any profit whatsoever under this bill, because he has no ownership of it, no liability for it, only a temporary use at no rent and perhaps no upkeep whatever, so that a company can earn nothing on that whatsoever, but he must supply management and he must assume all liabilities for the purchase of materials and equipment and labor to operate those plants. Now, it is unfair for him to be asked to do 25 times as much business as he normally would do and expand his force of management to that extent and leave him nothing for the many risks he takes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman from California and the gentleman from Iowa are especially solicitous of the airplane industry.

Mr. HINSHAW. I am from a national defense standpoint.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The aircraft industry is not the only war baby. There are perhaps five or ten thousand other items that are just as necessary to fight a war as the products of an airplane industry. They are what are commonly called war babies, and private capital is not going to invest in these war babies when they know that the minute hostilities cease there will be no war orders. There will be cancellations, and we certainly cannot legislate generally for these war babies and let the profiteers make all these tremendous profits out of war. We cannot expect private industry to build a munitions plant. We cannot expect private industry to build a gun factory or a powder factory, no more than we can expect them to build an airplane factory, because it is subject to that immediate cancellation. That is the basic reason and that is the logical reason that the Government has to put its own money into those enterprises for the purpose of making those items that are simply used for war purposes.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I agree with him that there are many other items of national defense that are going to suffer in their production under this strait-jacket.

Time alone keeps me from expanding beyond the airlines, the aircraft industry, and the strategic and critical materials field. Time alone has caused me to limit myself to these few fields I have discussed here today. I am forced to resort to a determination of degrees of essentiality in the discussion here. I think I have made enough points in this discussion so that any Member of Congress who reads them and studies them and ponders them well will agree with me that this is no place to make the hasty approach we have made on this legislation, and that this legislation should be carefully overhauled with particular emphasis on those wartime industries that will determine whether or not we survive as a Nation.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. May I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the renegotiation statutes which will be enacted can take care of any excess profits that may be left accidentally to any company engaged in the defense manufacturing business.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. That is my feeling in the matter. I have great reliance upon the renegotiation law, which I think Congress should enact without further delay. I had considerable experience with it during my service on the Committee on Military Affairs, and I know that that held down the flagrant cases that they would like to bring up here in a sort of hysterical appeal to grab so-called excess profits, all the while giving a sock in the solar plexis to the low-earnings industries that will be put out of existence right when we need them most.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. With reference to the remarks of the gentleman from California on renegotiation, I understand there are clauses contained now in appropriation bills which would cover contracts with the air industry. They would not need special renegotiation legislation. But the considered opinion of those who have worked with it is that it is not sufficiently inclusive to take the profits out. On the other hand, it is true no sensible person would want to pass a law or any part of a law that would keep this industry from functioning in this time of peril. If we have gone too far with it, we will have ample opportunity in the other body to see whether or not we have gone too far.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I thank the gentleman for that statement. That is exactly the premise upon which I base my entire debate. I told you at the outset I was in favor of an excess-profits tax law. I have engaged in this discussion here today primarily for the consideration of the Senate Committee on Finance. If I had no hope of their correcting and amending the bill to keep it from hampering our defense effort, I would not by any stretch of the imagination join in a movement that can and will by inadvertence put a wet blanket on these essential national defense industries.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP].

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, I have been interested in the discussion that has just preceded. I only wish the gentleman from Iowa had raised these points in the meetings of our committee.

When we left Washington in September, we left knowing that we had the solemn instruction of this House to return here and pass an excess-profits-tax bill.

We had the instruction, which was passed by a majority vote of this body, to do that. Therefore, my friends, I am somewhat surprised at the attack which has been made on this measure and at the name calling, when we are faced with one of the most critical situations that the Government has ever faced and when every businessman in the country knows that we are going to have to pay and pay. In the Revenue Act of 1950 which we passed in September, we raised the personal-income taxes of our people as of October 1. The corporations generally in this country expect to pay additional taxes.

It is only fair and just that taxes of corporations should be raised now. Immediately after peace was declared in 1945 as an aid to business and in order to encourage our business interests to return to civilian pursuits as rapidly as possible, the old excess-profits-tax law was repealed. As a matter of fact business expects this tax to be levied, and in the hearings just completed by our committee, which hearings began 3 weeks ago tomorrow, every phase of American business life was represented. Every company and every line of business was represented. Not one single business said that we should not raise corporate taxes. Of course, they hemmed and hawed and they said they would like to see it done this way or that way, but not a single man who was asked the question directly but answered and said, "Yes; taxes of corporations should be raised."

Let us look at the corporate-income picture for the last 5 or 6 years. I have seen a statement, a list of 50 of the largest corporations in America. This compilation shows that during the period for 1946 to 1949, as compared with the period from 1936 to 1939, profits have been more than 2½ times as much according to the money invested in the business, some making as much as 20 times as much. This is one of the most interesting compilations I have ever read on the subject of taxation. At the top of this list stands General Motors Corp. Next is United States Steel Corp. And the next is du Pont Corp. The average earnings of General Motors for the 4 years from 1946 to 1949 is 2.8 times as much proportionately as they were 4 years prior to 1940. That is nearly 3 times as much. United States Steel is 3.73 times as much, or nearly 4 times.

Du Pont's was 2.64 times as much. Jones & Laughlin Steel earned 1,702 percent, or 17 times as much over these past 4 years as it did 4 years immediately before 1940. The International Paper Co. earned 1,468 percent, nearly 15 times as much. B. F. Goodrich Co. earned 1,048 percent, over 10 times as much.

When people get up here and cry about these corporations, about this hard tax, that it should not be passed, that it should be studied more, just remember that they themselves know they should be taxed. Not a man who appeared before us said they should not.

I received one of the most surprising letters I have ever received since I have been in Congress. I represent an industrial district. My district is largely textile, and that is not a line that earns very large profits, but their profits are steady. My district is surpassed by only one or two other districts in the United States in the number of spindles in it.

I want to read from a letter I received from the president of one of the biggest mills in my district. This is a quotation from this man's letter:

> I know that you have had numerous suggestions and opinions regarding taxes, so I feel at liberty to express my views in regard to excess-profits tax on corporations. I am now, and have always been, firmly of the opinion that as soon as possible we should take the profit out of war. Unless Congress passes an excess-profits tax on corporations, many of them will profit more than they ever have in the past, and not pay their proportionate part of the war cost. Any firm or organization that opposes an excess-profits tax, in my opinion, does so wholly from a selfish standpoint. I hope that you will not let anyone persuade you differently. In my humble opinion, the excess-profits tax should allow corporations to make the average profit they made during the years 1947, 1948, 1949, or be allowed either 6 or 8 percent on their capital investment. This would take care of practically every business in this country and all of them would be on an equal basis. I am fairly familiar with tax laws, and to me the long-term capital gains of 6 months and not having an excess-profits-tax law will allow hundreds of millions of dollars to go by untaxed.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Judging by the speech we heard yesterday, and if we place reliance on that, we would believe that nobody but the CIO was in favor of an excess-profits-tax law.

Mr. CAMP. I quite agree with the gentleman. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If the CIO or any other group or any other one individual wrote this tax bill now before the House, I do not know anything about it. This is a committee bill that was written after long and careful hearings and reasonable consideration. The testimony of our experts and the staff are responsible for this bill, and they are no more under the influence of the CIO than the gentleman from Georgia or the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your bringing that to my attention. I was going to say something about it. I was not only surprised, but in a way I was hurt by the remarks that were made. No bill was presented to this committee. No suggestion bill was brought before us by the Treasury, by the President, or by anyone; and I feel sure that if my friend from Iowa who just spoke about the airplane industry had brought those facts to the attention of the committee we might possibly have exempted the airplane industry from the bill. This bill was written in committee.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. The gentleman from Iowa brought that before the committee day after day.

Mr. CAMP. He never made any motion about the airplane industry; he made it about strategic minerals, and I voted with him every time he mentioned it. This airplane industry business is new entirely to me.

Let me tell you something: We are going to have to raise all taxes. We came back here just to deal with an excess-profits-tax bill. We should already have passed a renegotiation act. That is going to be the first thing we do when we get back here in January; and then we ought to take the whole tax structure and, Mr. Chairman, we ought to tax everything who is not being taxed. With taxes as high as they are going to be, they should fall evenly and justly on everybody, high or low, corporate or whatnot. We are going to have to do something about these so-called charitable organizations that are not paying any tax yet are running businesses; we are going to have to do something about cooperatives. We have one cooperative within less than a hundred miles of Washington which calls itself a poultry cooperative, yet it operates a 10-cent store in the Capital City. Now, you know that is not right.

I have no tears to shed for American industry because it does not want your sympathy; it is plenty able to take care of itself. God bless it. I believe in the capitalistic system. I believe in everybody being allowed to pursue any business he wishes, and I want them to make money at it. I do not believe in inordinate taxation, but, bless your souls, the corporations of America are willing to pay this tax; they are willing to do it and they know they are supposed to do it.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. When I was home recently the local representative of one of the biggest textile mills in the South told me in effect what this constituent of yours has written you, that the excess-profits tax was the way to get this money.

Mr. CAMP. Now, understand, this is not really and truly an excess profits bill solely. I thought that it ought to be based on 100 percent of the basic year and sat there and voted day after day to try to make it that way. This is a compromise. I went along with it because it provides 85 percent of that base and also because during the past 4 years profits have been so large that we cut the base on the average corporation.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman vote for my motion to recommit to make the base 100 percent?

Mr. CAMP. No; I will not, because we have reached a compromise on it and I think this legislation should be passed; I think the time for dillying and dallying has gone. The idea of passing this great big armament bill on to future generations I think is folly. Every Member of Congress should seriously consider four or five things and one is cutting down civilian spending to the bone; another is making the tax rate fall on everyone equally, justly, and evenly, and then put a tax bill through that will bring in the money to pay for it. That is the way to make America strong.

I was surprised at the charges that this was a CIO bill. I never saw any CIO representative. If the CIO had any suggestions to make they were mighty small. They never appeared before our committee except for a 15-minute speech.

There are no politics in taxing our people to pay for this war and its preparation. There should not be and there is not any politics in this measure.

The provisions of the bill have been explained by preceding speakers. It is a much fairer bill in every way than the last excess-profits-tax law was. If a company experiences any unusual hardship during the base period like a strike or a fire which destroys their plant, putting them out of business a year or two, there are two or three alternatives they may have. They can figure their tax on an industrial basis, an average of the industry all over the country, or they can go on a capital stock basis, an investment basis, taking their earnings depending on size.

If a new industry is started up and does not have an experience of 4 years, there is special treatment here for such cases.

This is a much better bill than the other one and there will be many, many less appeals to the Tax Court under the hardship provisions than there were under the other bills. This bill also contains a $25,000 minimum base. Any small corporation that earns that much or less does not have to be considered at all. This bill will apply strictly to corporate business and American business expects it. If they did not get this bill they would wink their eye and smile out of the other side of their mouth.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a perfect bill. No tax bill is perfect. But it is a good bill, it should be passed promptly. We should go home and come back prepared to pass a better, larger and finer tax program because we are going to need it.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, we are engaged in a great war, the third world war since 1917, or three wars in 33 years. I have been telling this Congress and the people that this Korean matter would lead to a long world war and now there are few who doubt what I have been saying.

I did not vote for the United Nations; I did not vote for the Atlantic Pact because I was certain in my own mind that with any numbers of combinations, ideal on paper, when danger came, we would be alone. That has come to pass too. We have had token support from the United Nations, but when we have lost 20 men to 1 man lost by the other United Nations, we can see that we stand alone.

We left our shores in 1917 and 1918 to make the world safe for democracy, and when it was over democracy was safe nowhere on earth, except here. We fought World War No. II to bring the "four freedoms" to the people everywhere in the world—freedom from fear, freedom from want, freedom of speech, and the freedom of religion. We won the war but did we establish those freedoms everywhere? Is there no fear in the world? Is there no want in the world; Is there free speech and a free press throughout the nations of the earth? Is there the right on the part of people everywhere to worship as they choose?

We are strong at winning wars but we seem adept at losing the peace.

We are in this war to stop aggression everywhere and we counted on a band of United Nations to aid us in stopping these aggressions. Did we count correctly? How many nations of the 60 in the United Nations have come forward with their men to aid us in stopping aggression?

South Korea nestling up against Communist countries with over a billion population was ruthlessly invaded by the Communists. The United Nations very emphatically ordered resistance. We did our part to carry out the mandates of the United Nations, and went in to stop the aggression. Ideally it was the thing to do but practically it could not be done since we found ourselves fighting almost alone 7,000 miles from home up against a billion Communists. The worst spot in the world was picked to try out the theory of stopping aggression. We are now up against the hordes of China and the hordes of Russia as soon as needed.

Had we driven the North Koreans out of South Korea and stopped at the thirty-eighth parallel, we might have stopped this aggression for a time, but only for a time as Russia the master mind of communism never has had any other intention than to destroy capitalism everywhere as soon as she can get to it.

Russia has thwarted every attempt at world peace and has been able to do so by being a member of the UN.

TAXES

This direct matter before us is a tax bill. We are up against a long war regardless of how we got there. We cannot back up now. The die is cast. The people of the United States must realize that we cannot spend billions in the defense of democracy without having tax money to do it with, and I would be the last Member of this Congress to refuse to vote for a tax bill that has the possibility of raising more money. So far as I am personally concerned the Government can take the savings of my entire lifetime if it is necessary to preserve this democracy. The freedom we enjoy under our system is worth the price we shall have to pay to protect it.

While supporting this measure, without equivocation it seems to me that it is in order to point out what the final results of our efforts is likely to be and to ask a few questions that bother me, and I am sure bother the people of the United States.

First, can we alone police the world? Can we without any more help than we are now getting from the UN stop aggression in every part of the world? Since the United Nations have demonstrated that they have no power except to debate; since it can find no way to keep Russia out of the Councils, just what does this talkative United Nations expect to do? Are we to let a weak, impotent, organization like this formulate our foreign policy?

Is not the time here now when we shall have to decide for ourselves what is best for this democracy and is not the time here now when we should think of preserving our own democracy instead of racing around the world to police aggressors everywhere? If the UN showed any signs at all of defending themselves against the hordes of communism, we might fight it out until they decided to enter the conflict. But in my opinion this organization is impotent, powerless, and totally unaware of the fate that awaits them. Shall we gamble further or shall we decide to protect this democracy and save at least one Nation from the clutches of murderers, thieves, and hypocrites?

I would like to ask a few further questions: Why do we not give Japan her freedom and permit her to arm herself? Are we doing the right thing by holding Japan powerless while the hordes across the bay will crush Japan as their next move? Have we the moral right to hold a nation in bondage while her destruction is being planned in plain sight and view?

Have we the moral right to refuse the assistance of the Nationalist army of China which is more than willing to enter the contest?

Have we the moral right to not make an absolute peace with Germany and permit her to defend herself if she cares to do it?

We are in this thing and in it alone, and we should now formulate a policy of our own accord and leave the debating to the United Nations—at least go it alone until such time as these other nations come out of their trance.

I do not ask these questions to harass the administration or the President. I ask them to the end that all this tax money shall not be spent on useless enterprises and negotiations. I believe the President to be a great American and I believe he is doing all he knows how to do to protect this country, but the time has come when we cannot win this war by fighting among ourselves; the time has come when the Congress must stand up on its hind legs and advise with the President, not only on our foreign policy, but to forget that we are Republicans or Democrats, and fight ourselves out of the menace we are in, and have some control over what is to be done next. That is our duty and we should not shirk it.

Make this tax money available and insist that the questions I have asked here be answered and demonstrate to the world that when our country is in danger, that we arise as one and contribute our lives and our property to the protection of the greatest form of government on the earth.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, in July 1945 when moderation of the then existing excess-profits tax was being considered, in a speech opposing the amendment, I stated on the floor of this House:

It is my firm belief that there is no justification for anyone to make excess profits out of war, anywhere, anytime, while men are bleeding and dying on the field of battle.

I have not changed my views.

But to frame legislation which will prevent war profiteering and not at the same time add fuel to the fires of inflation, which will not put a stop to productive development of new ideas, and which will not result in extreme inequities between corporations who happen to have for many reasons a very different record of earnings in what we determine is the base period, is an almost impossible task.

I have never favored an excess-profits tax in time of peace. I do not believe that in normal times, in a free economy, there is any such thing as excess profits, for it is only in the hope of making excessive profits that men are stimulated to take the necessary risks which have in the past, and will in the future, expand our industrial machine, develop new products; and thus increase the standard of living for all the American people.

We would never have had our great automobile industry, we would never have had our great chemical industry, we would never had had the development of plastics, or television, if those who took the risks of investment in these industries which have given such fine wages to so many millions of our citizens had had their earnings limited to any such figure as proposed in the present bill.

Today we do not know what we will be faced with, either in the immediate future or over the next few years. Perhaps we will know better before this session adjourns. Will it be an all-out war, or will it be merely a long drawn-out defense program continuing over the next 10 or 15 years? Whichever it is, we know that the American taxpayer will have to produce for the Treasury more billions than ever could have been dreamed of just a short time ago.

If it is to be immediate all-out war for a limited period, any tax—no matter how inequitable—can be made to work fairly well owing to the patriotism of our people. Even the World War II excess-profits tax with all its faults was accepted without too much complaint, while the war was on, even though all will acknowledge now that it added greatly to the inflationary pressure which during the conflict was held down by price controls but burst out of bounds the moment that they were lifted.

An excess-profits tax of the type in effect during World War II, if it is to work properly, must be accompanied by price and wage controls.

If in writing this bill we are envisioning merely a long period of heavy rearmament, I believe that a 75-percent rate is too high, for it will hinder the much needed expansion and development of new discoveries so necessary not only for the expansion of our war industries but for supplying the needs of our people and giving good jobs to our ever-increasing population.

As evidence of such a result, I want to quote from Bradley Dewey, United States Rubber Director in World War II, which appears on page 610 of the hearings. Mr. Dewey said:

> There is a new opportunity on which we have been researching for 4 years. It is ready now. It will take $1,000,000 to do it. Should I do it under these conditions? Most of the profit will go into taxes. Is it fair to my stockholders to risk money in a new venture for that? I do not think so.

Now I believe that in this critical time we should have an excess-profits tax as much for psychological reasons as for any other. But unless an all-out war develops, I believe that a tax of 67 percent rather than 75 percent would in the end result in more development of needed products, would ultimately bring more revenue and would be less inflationary—for I believe that if a businessman could be assured that he could at least keep one-third of any additional profits which he would make he would take the risk of developing a new product and would not be so inclined to the waste and extravagance which is inevitable—human nature being what it is—when it is true that such a large proportion of any additional costs are paid for by Uncle Sam.

Interesting testimony which appears on page 572 of the hearings was given by Leo Cherne, of the Research Institute of America, as the result of a questionnaire which he sent to businessmen. His replies show that—

> At a 70-percent tax rate, 64 percent of businesmen say that they would be more inclined to make business expenditures for salaries, advertising, etc., on the basis of tax consequences rather than business policy. At a 60-percent tax rate only 38 percent of the replies said that tax consequences would be their prime motive.

So this would confirm my conclusion that a figure of somewhere between 60 and 70 percent would be the most equitable and productive.

Of course, the first thing that we should have done was to take excessive profits out of Government contracts having to do with war by a strict renegotiation act. I do not understand why the Democratic majority puts the cart before the horse by first bringing up this bill.

The Secretary's suggestion of taking a base of 75 percent of the 1946–49 base as a normal earning period was entirely dishonest. This would have resulted in half of the revenue from the bill coming from normal profits rather than profits stemming from the war. If the committee had passed its gag rule against any witnesses discussing anything except an excess-profits tax before the Secretary of the Treasury appeared he should have been ruled out of order for his suggestion.

It seems to me that this recommendation was arrived at after he decided at what rate the tax should be set by going lower and lower on the base until he found a percentage which would bring the revenue which they desired.

The 85-percent base in this bill is naturally a little better. But why should we tax some billions of normal earnings under guise of taxing excess profits? Why not be honest about it, and if we are going to tax normal profits raise the surtax rate? An increase in the surtax rate by 5 percent as will be proposed in the recommittal motion by a member of the minority, with an honest 100-percent base, would increase the much-needed revenue of the Treasury by $500,000,000 more than the bill before us. In fact, if the income of corporations increases from nearly $40,000,000,000, as at present, to $48,000,000,000, as is predicted by most economists, the Republican proposal would yield approximately $6,400,000,000, or $1,800,000,000, more than the revenue estimated under the present bill.

If the recommittal motion is adopted, it would not delay passage of the bill more than a few minutes, for the committee would be instructed to report the bill back with these few changes forthwith, and the committee could do this while the other Members of the House waited.

Certainly in light of the President's request for $17,000,000,000 additional appropriations we must increase the revenue; the recommittal motion, if adopted, would do so.

The present bill is retroactive to July 1. I think that there is justification for making it retroactive to October 1 for the action taken by this House in late September put all businessmen on notice that there would be an excess-profits tax and that it would be retroactive. But I do not see the justification for retroactivity back to July for decisions by businessmen made at that time were not made with any thought that we were in a period in which the excess-profits tax was applicable.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his appearance before the Senate Finance Committee on yesterday criticized the action of the House in giving special treatment to certain companies which are regulated by public bodies. There is little justification for his criticism, for if the State commission do then get property these companies cannot make excess profits.

The public utility companies are limited in the rates which they are allowed to charge to what a local commission believes is a fair rate considering the amount of risks taken by the investors and a rate which will provide the new capital necessary for expansion. In New Jersey, in general, this rate is about 5½ percent. Rate bodies are always loath to increase the charge to the consumers even when a period of inflation greatly raises the costs to the company, so that few utilities are even earning the amount allowed by the local commission.

If we had not given special consideration to these concerns, under this bill the companies would have had two options: One to go under the average earnings formula and then reduce the base by 15 percent. These companies have not profited and will not profit from the war economy, and the result would have been that they would be paying excess-profits taxes on their normal earnings even though these were much lower than what the utility commission stated was a fair return.

I have figured out what the return would be for a typical large utility company under the other alternative—the average earnings basis. Take a company which had sixty millions of equity capital and was borrowing forty millions at 3 percent. Under the invested capital formula the allowable return to this concern, before they were subject to excess profits, would be less than 4½ percent.

Now the utility boards say that these companies are entitled to earn 5½ percent and that this is necessary in order that they should secure the new capital for expansion. If we passed a bill, as was recommended by the administration, without any special consideration for regulated industries, it would be inevitable that the rates paid by consumers would have to be sharply increased. And of their increase $3 would be going to the Government and only $1 to the company.

The end result would be that the consumers—the users of gas, electricity, and water—would be paying the excess-profits tax. I do not think it is the intent of Congress thus to soak the little fellow.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for the recommittal motion with the hope that this legislation will be immediately improved and sent over to the Senate this afternoon. But all legislation is a matter of compromise, and the time is rare indeed when we find a bill here in the exact form that any of us would have written it; so if the recommittal motion fails, I will support the bill as written on final passage.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if there has ever been a time in the history of our great Nation when we faced a graver crisis or a more severe challenge to our country and its institutions. All that we do here now is more important, more significant, and more vital than at any time in the past history of our great Nation. The legislation which we are considering today and which we debated on yesterday is only one prong in the weapons which we are attempting to build to resist the most serious assault upon democratic institutions in history.

I approach my part of the discussion of this bill reluctantly, because in doing so I feel that I am called upon to answer some of the allegations made on this floor yesterday by my dear friend, the minority leader of our committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED]. I had hoped, and I believe that the time will come certainly before the next Congress has ceased its work, that we could face the issues confronting our Nation without partisanship. We must so face the issues if we are to survive as a nation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] on yesterday challenged the work of the 15 Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, and I would say, by indirection at least, the motives of the four Republican members of that committee who, on the vote to determine whether or not the bill would be reported out, joined with the 15 Democrats and voted affirmatively to report this legislation.

The minority leader of our committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], after making the statement that the fiscal policies of the Government of the United States should be approached in a nonpartisan fashion, later said, and I quote from page 16084 of the RECORD of yesterday:

> Apparently the policies and principles so agreed upon were not to the liking of the administration. Apparently they were not to the liking of the CIO. Apparently they were not to the liking of the Democratic Party. Apparently they were not to the liking of a majority of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means—even though the adoption of these principles and policies was possible only by the combined vote of a few of the members of the Democratic Party and the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Out came the whip. The lashes were applied. Secret sessions were held. By a vote of a majority of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, certain of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means were deprived of the privilege of voting according to their own judgment and the dictates of their own consciences. Caucus rules were called upon. Each of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means was bound by the majority vote of his own party. He forsook his constituents. He abandoned his duties, his privileges, his responsibilities.

Mr. Chairman, I submit—and I am genuinely fond of my friend from New York—that the language which I have just read and much of the language contained elsewhere in the discussion by the gentleman from New York is untrue, is libelous, and is a slander upon all the members of what I consider one of the great committees of this Congress.

Let us analyze some of the allegations: No. 1, the distinguished minority leader said that we wrote this bill according to the dictates of the CIO. Let us talk about that just a moment. During the testimony the only witness who appeared for the CIO was Mr. Stanley H. Ruttenberg, director of the department of education and research of the CIO. In reply to questioning by the gentleman from New York he said:

> I daresay that the Secretary of the Treasury did not follow many of the recommendations, Mr. Congressman, we suggested—
>
> Referring to the CIO—
> from $6,000,000,000 to $7,000,000,000 to come from an excess-profits tax. I think the Secretary suggested only $4,000,000,000.

That is No. 1. The witness of the CIO himself and the only CIO witness before this committee disagreed in toto with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Did the committee agree with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury? Did the committee write the bill as Mr. Snyder had suggested?

Let me say this, however, that I believe Secretary Snyder is an able man; I know that he is an honest man, and I believe that the recommendations which he made were made upon the basis of the best information he had before him and in light of what he considered were the best interests of the United States of America. But even so, our committee which stands accused in this language of being a rubber stamp and disregarding the fiscal soundness of the United States of America, and we individual Members who have been accused of abandoning our duties, forsaking our constituents and responsibilities, what did we do? We worked out a formula which was not the Treasury Department's formula. We came up with a program which was not the Treasury Department's program. It was the program largely of all of the members of the Ways and Means Committee.

Let me give you an illustration. There was debated in the committee the base period, whether or not we should have a 100-percent base before we applied any excess-profits tax. For the benefit of you who have not followed this too closely, may I say, by way of illustration, that if the base period earnings were $10,000, then there would be no excess-profits tax until the net earnings exceeded $10,000. The Treasury recommended that 25 percent of that $10,000, to take a rough figure, should be subject to a 75-percent excess-profits rate. Some members of the Ways and Means Committee agreed with that. Others wanted it to be a straight 100 percent. We debated the matter back and forth and finally the members of the committee, without a party lash, believe me, and without heat or hysteria or haste, and with the best evidence available to us from one of the finest staffs on Capitol Hill, decided upon the 85-percent base-period rate.

My distinguished friend from New York says that we violated the mandate enacted by this Congress in September of the present year. Let me read that mandate to you:

> SEC. 701. (a) The House Committee on Ways and Means and the Senate Committee on Finance are hereby directed to report to the respective Houses of Congress a bill for raising revenue by the levying, collecting, and payment of corporate excess-profits taxes with retroactive effect to October 1 or July 1, 1950, said bill to originate—

And so on and so on. Can there be any doubt about what that mandate says? Does it say to raise personal income taxes? No; it does not. Why did it not say so? Because in the bill which we had up for consideration then we had raised the personal limits. Does it say to raise the normal or surtax on corporations? It does not. Why does it not? Because in the very bill in which this provision is contained there is a provision raising those levies on corporations.

So I submit to the fair-minded Members of this body that the members of the Ways and Means Committee had no alternative except to carry out in detail and to the best of our ability the mandate given to us by this Congress.

Was it a one-sided mandate? Not by a long shot. You will remember we had a conference report and we had a motion to submit the tax bill to conference. The previous question was voted down, and the vote on it was 106 to 226. Then we voted on the motion offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER] which was substantially this language, and it carried 331 to 2.

Later, when the conference had met and had labored and done its work and came back with the Revenue Act of 1950, this body voted, with section 701 incorporated therein, 328 to 7 for the conference report. So, I submit, my friends, that if ever a committee was bound by a mandate, the Committee on Ways and Means was bound. The language was definite, it was specific, and allowed no alternative.

But, let us pass on for a moment and discuss some of the other allegations. The allegation, for instance, that no one was given an opportunity to be heard. Well, I will say to you Members of the House that the members of the Committee on Ways and Means returned here 2 weeks before anybody else did, and we sat here in this very room and we listened to about 100 witnesses in 7 days. If I were to inject partisanship into this discussion I might contrast that to the paucity of the hearings held on House bill 1 in the Eightieth Congress when my brethren to the left decided to greatly weaken the fiscal structure of the United States of America; 2 days of hearings, 2 days of executive sessions for that legislative monstrosity. We had seven full days of hearings. We listened to 100 witnesses representing every segment of business in America. And then what did we do in executive session?

You ask anybody on the Committee on Ways and Means. I tell you you I have a chairman that works harder than anybody in Congress. He is younger than most anybody around here. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] was on the job 10 hours a day in the commitee room, worked nights and early in the morning in his own office, and most of the other members of the committee were there, too. Did we have the benefit of information or were we acting under the leash?

Well, on September 23 or thereabouts after the mandate came from this body and the other body, the chairman of our committee summoned the staff of the Committee on Ways and Means and the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue and instructed those staffs that beginning on November 15 they must be fully and adequately prepared for this bill. I can show you Members of this body a stack of material that high prepared diligently, representing night after night after night of work and study and effort, and, if anything, this body owes the staff of that committee and the joint committee a rising vote of thanks and gratitude for a magnificent job. There is not a single solitary principle enunciated in this bill that was not fully and adequately explained to every member of the committee.

In conclusion let me say this: I notice, among other things in the remarks of my friend from New York on page 16085, this statement:

> There is virtually no such thing today as venture capital. Most of the sources have dried up and disappeared. What capital remains does not dare venture and our officials seem to be surprised at the increase in bank credit.

And then in another paragraph he says that profits this year, 1950, mind you, have increased by at least $6,000,000,000 over 1949. He says further, in criticizing the base period, that one of the bad things about it is that the corporations, many of them, were involved upon tremendous experimental programs and development programs costing huge sums of money and producing no income during these 4 years, and above all that the industries were spending $100,000,000,000 in expansion.

In one breath he says there is no venture capital—in the next he says that one hundred billion was spent on expansion, when we had no venture capital.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is it not a fact that the best estimate we can get is that only about 70,000 of the 400,000 corporations in the country, or 17 percent, would under this bill pay any excess-profits tax at all?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. That is my understanding.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yet they say they defy any business to operate under this bill if it becomes the law. Those are the most prosperous corporations, and the average they would pay would be only $42,857. Only 17 percent of the corporations would be affected by this bill if it became law.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. My distinguished chairman is eminently correct.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the time when the $100,000,000,000 was spent by private industry on expansion, and so forth, was a time when we had no excess profits tax.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman, but it was also a time when, by distinguished friend from New York said, we had no venture capital.

That brings me to a discussion of the so-called alternative, about which you have heard so much. What is that alternative and what would it do? What we have proposed here is a modest bill, which taxes 17 percent of the corporations, those earning excess profits, not normal profits, excess profits in war.

What do the minority propose? They say we have an alternative. What is the alternative? The alternative is to impose across the board without regard to where the profits may have come from an over-all corporate tax which, in my humble judgment, would put out of business countless thousands of the smaller corporations in America. That is the proposal. It is not a proposal of relief, it is is not a proposal to tax excess profits made possible as a result of inflated spending brought on by a national emergency, it is a proposal to establish across the board the highest corporate tax levied in history. If that be sound fiscal policy, then I say, thank God for the Democratic members of this committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If the gentleman will yield further, is it not a fact that under that procedure a number of corporations that are not now making a reasonable profit would be reached and have to pay an excess-profits tax?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. There is no question about it. They would pay a greatly inflated corporate tax.

In conclusion, this bill is not a difficult bill. This bill does not have all of the complexities about which you have heard my friends talk, not anything of the kind. This bill is soundly worked out, it has been soundly considered. It seeks to give relief where relief is needed. It is based on the fundamental and sound principle that where the Government is spending billions of dollars to defend our people, where it is putting into the Army and the Navy and the Air Force thousands upon thousands of young men, where it is telling one segment of business that it must curtail its activities because of shortages of this or that product, where it is regimenting and controlling, and where conditions are anything but normal, then that Government should say to the people of the United States, "We will have universal sacrifice in this time of emergency."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the members of the Ways and Means Committee for their hard work during the past few weeks and their promptness in reporting out the excess-profits-tax bill, H. R. 9827. Members of the committee have discharged well the mandate we gave them by writing into section 701 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1950 a provision that the committee should proceed to report out excess-profits-tax legislation during the present Congress.

The excess-profits-tax bill is emergency legislation. During World War II we found it necessary to enact tax legislation of this nature. Today, we are faced with another emergency, which carries with it the sinister threat of devastating war and which increases in intensity as each day goes by.

In mobilizing our strength for national defense, in preparing ourselves for this emergency, every group and every individual must be prepared to sacrifice. Every segment of the Nation must carry its share of the loan and those who can carry the most must expect to do just that.

It is a well-known fact, as the Secretary of the Treasury pointed out in his statement before the committee, that in the period of expanded business activity we now experience, gains have been most striking in corporate profits. During the 4 years that followed World War II, corporate profits rose above any previous level in history. During the years 1946–49, corporation profits averaged $29,000,000,000 before deduction of taxes. This was more than five times the 1936–39 average and it enabled corporations to pay dividends at record rates and still reinvest substantial earnings. The figures show that corporations' profits for 1950 will reach a new high of $37,000,000,000 before taxes, or $3,000,000,000 in excess of the peak year of 1948.

It is necessary to siphon off some of those heavy profits in order to help pay the cost of the defense program, to reduce inflationary pressures, and to eliminate war profiteering. A primary justification for the excess-profits tax is that no one should be allowed to profit unduly from the necessities of a Nation mobilizing for defense. I believe in profit-making, but not in profiteering. The excess-profits tax is designed to recapture a percentage of profits above a normal or average earning experienced over a specified period.

No tax is ideal, and all taxes impose inequities. The excess-profits tax bill which we consider today has taken account of hardship cases and special problems. In general the bill appears to be more liberal than the legislation in effect during World War II. The minimum credit allowance of $25,000 will relieve small corporations from the excess-profits tax and encourage their growth at a time when the bulk of defense contracts are being awarded to the giant industrial firms.

The committee estimates in its report that the present bill would affect about 70,000 corporations in the calendar year 1950 and perhaps 80,000 the following year. In other words, less than one-fourth of all corporations would be subject to excess-profits taxation. During the years 1940–45 the number of corporations paying excess-profits taxes was less than one-fourth of all corporation income-tax payers. But the relatively few corporations with excess profits accounted for a very large total of corporation incomes. Thus the corporations that get the most defense contracts and enjoy the greatest benefit from the defense boom are rightfully required to return a portion of their profits.

The committee estimates that the present bill will yield $3,000,000,000 from excess-profits tax on corporate profits at the level existing in the calendar year 1950 and about $4,600,000,000 with the level of corporate profits which may reasonably be expected in the calendar year 1951. In view of the record high profit rate, the heavy additional military expenditure requirements outlined by the President, the excess-profits tax bill strikes me as very moderate indeed.

In my opinion, we have been going about our task of legislating for defense too gingerly. The time has come to dispense with "business as usual." American soldiers fighting in Korea have been torn away from their normal civilian pursuits and from their homes and their families. There is no "business as usual" for the GI.

When we were debating the defense-production bill in August of this year I said to the Members that a piecemeal method of combating inflation would not suffice. What I said then is even truer today. Wholesale prices are going up; cost of living is going up; and the defense dollar buys less with each passing day. We are courting economic disaster unless we face up to the problems of inflation and institute a program of control across the board. Such a course has long been advocated by one of the wisest of our elder statesmen, Bernard Baruch. Not only is Mr. Baruch a wise statesman, but he has been one of our eminent financiers.

When the security of our Nation is threatened it is the duty of the strong to protect the weak. The strongest physically of our citizens, the young men, are called upon to risk their lives. Is it too much to insist that the financially strong among our citizens, whether it be individuals or corporations, shall risk their abnormal profits? My answer is, No. I shall vote for the taxing of excess wartime profits.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, we are legislating today on this tax bill in an environment that makes it extremely difficult for any of us to know exactly what should be done at this critical hour. If we knew today that tomorrow we were going to be in an all-out shooting war, this legislation would be most inadequate, and I think it would be a waste of time to consider it, because the requirements should certainly be much more drastic. If, however, the future is to be a long period of battle between the Communist economies and the economies of the free world, then another type of tax legislation, I believe, would be advisable.

At the time the Ways and Means Committee was considering this legislation I believe what it had in mind was a continuing long-run strain upon our economy and upon the need for governmental expenditures in the defense field and my remarks today are addressed to that kind of situation and the type of tax legislation I think is necessary to meet that situation.

No matter what the environment, the issue today is not whether additional revenue should be raised—certainly everybody must agree that it must be raised; nor is the issue on the amount that should be raised—I believe everybody here will agree that we must raise every possible cent we can in order to bring our revenues into balance with our expenditures. There is only one issue and all other arguments are extraneous to that one issue; that issue concerns itself with the method or the formula to be used in applying an additional tax on corporate income. That is all there is in the issue before the Congress. I do not think the honest Member of Congress would object to the taxing or even confiscating in wartime, and possibly even in peacetime, of excess profits. "Excess" is a bad word; it is like sin; we are all against it. But I think we would all want to be very certain they were excess profits that we were confiscating or taxing at a very high rate. Our principal difficulty and the difficulty that I had in trying to reach a conclusion on this legislation comes about from the impossibility of determining what is normal and what is excessive in the field of profits. I am reminded of the words of Secretary Vinson in 1945 when he said:

> The difficulty is that calling profits excessive does not make them excessive, and calling profits normal does not make them normal.

Mr. Chairman, here is the principal trouble we have had during this whole matter. We have heard speaker after speaker get up here and say that what we are doing is taxing excess profits. "We are taxing the profits out of war," they say. But again I would repeat, calling any profits, no matter what they may be, excessive cannot make them excessive or calling them normal cannot make them normal.

The proponents of this legislation say that 85 percent of the profits of businesses making profits in excess of $25,000 per year during 1946 to 1949 is normal, that 15 percent of every company's earnings in this period, however, is excessive. Let me refer to a chart presented to the committee by the Secretary of the Treasury wherein it shows the variation between industries in 1947 and the profits that they earned on net worth.

He showed at that time, for instance, that profits ranged from a 7-percent profit on the net worth of some corporations—principally communications—to a rate of return on net worth for the lumber industry of 35 percent, all of that, of course, before taxes—certainly an extreme variation. I questioned the Secretary during his appearance before the committee as to what information he had as to the variation within any one of these classifications. In other words, what was the variation by companies. He was unable to furnish the information. He said he would furnish the information but it would be quite a task and I therefore withdrew my request for the information. He did admit, however, that it varied from a minus factor, as far as an individual company is concerned in these groups, to a figure in excess of the average. Of course, there had to be some concerns making in excess of 35 percent or you would not get a 35-percent average. And the same way in communications, you must have had some making more and some making considerably less than 7 percent. In fact, we know it went from a subzero figure of return on net worth to an excess of the figure shown in the Secretary's chart.

What are we doing in this particular legislation? You are not legislating on averages. You are not saying, for instance, in the communications industry, 7 percent shall be normal or in the lumber industry that 35 percent shall be normal. What you are doing is legislating on the basis of what an individual company did in that particular period.

Now, we know that the rate of return of individual companies does not follow an exact pattern; that much depends on many factors, such as public acceptance of the product of a particular manufacturer at a particular time, the goodwill of the company as it happens to exist during this particular base period, and also population change itself exerts a very great influence; also, management factors are not fixed. By this bill you will take the profit of the individual business in a limited period of 4 years and say that 85 percent of that profit is normal and that any increase is excess profit which will carry a tax rate of 75 percent. That, to me, is one of the basic defects not only of this legislation but it is bound to be in any tax bill that taxes on the basis of a fixed history of a given concern over a limited period of time. I think the inequity that will result from such an assumption that 85 percent of the average business profits of a given taxpayer between 1946 and 1949 are normal and 15 percent are excessive is apparent on its surface.

Much has been said here that we want to tax everybody alike; that what we want to do is to impose this tax on the basis of ability to pay. Let us see if that is really what we are doing in this legislation. Instead of being based on ability to pay, this tax will be assessed on the basis of a company's experience during 1946 to 1949. Who are the companies with favorable profits during that period? They are the established businesses, the mature businesses, businesses that have reached the maturity of their earning capacity, and so forth; they are the businesses that were able to convert readily from war production into a consumer line of production to meet the consumer demands that had been penned up during the war; they are the businesses that had the character of a monopoly so that there was not a competitive situation. Those were the people with the largest profit picture during 1946–49, and those are the companies and the corporations that will pay the least amount of taxes. Who is going to have the unfavorable profit picture during this base period and whose increased earnings are you going to tax at a rate of 75 percent? The young companies; the companies that have not had a chance to reach maturity; the growing companies; the companies who could not convert as readily from war production to a peacetime basis; yes, and those industries where there is the greatest competition. Those are the companies that are going to be at a disadvantage, and that is where you are going to place the major burden of this excess-profits tax presented to you today. I defy any Member of the majority to justify that kind of a tax on the basis of ability to pay, on the basis of fairness, and on the basis of equity. It is the weak and the young and the growing companies that are going to bear the burden and who are going to be prejudiced by this tax. Make no mistake about it.

I do not believe that that is the way this Congress wants to levy taxes. It is certainly not the way that I will legislate.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. We must not let this picture get out of our minds, because the other side is becoming very sensitive of any criticism of the bill or their solution of this problem. But the fact is that only three or possibly four witnesses during the hearing of 200 witnesses, including leading economists of this country, thought otherwise. Everyone else condemned this bill along the line that the gentleman now is addressing the House. It seems to me that the people who are going to produce the goods in this country for war ought to receive some consideration by any committee that wants to preserve its self-respect before the country.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I concur in the gentleman's statement. I think it is most serious, particularly at this time, when we look forward to an American economy that must be able to provide the weapons and to produce the goods that are needed to fight this war; that will produce the things that are necessary to keep this country the strong country that it has been in the past and that we hope it will continue to be in order that we can win the battle against communism.

Mr. Chairman, in all fairness I must say this: This bill is a much better bill than the excess-profits-tax bill which was on the statute books during World War II. I think the committee has made progress in attempting to soften some of the hardships and some of the inequities. But, they cannot be removed. They can be softened but they cannot be removed from any legislation which is based upon an individual company's particular experience in a given base period, no matter how hard you try. You cannot do it in 145 pages as has been attempted here; you cannot do it in 1,000 pages.

I do, however, Mr. Chairman, want to compliment the committee on at least making some progress. However, I shall vote against the bill. I have two basic reasons for doing so.

One reason is that in my judgment it is discriminatory and unfair. It is not based on ability to pay. Those who were able to make the big earnings in 1946 to 1949 are the favored group, and those who made the small earnings in this period will now be penalized under it.

My second reason is that I think this legislation, viewed in the light of a future which is going to require the greatest producing enterprise, the greatest of research, and the greatest of development, will stifle such production and such research and development. Our urgent need is certainly for greater production, greater research, and greater development, and nothing, in my judgment, should stand in the way of accomplishing that objective. Yet I am most fearful that this legislation, by freezing an individual company to its 1946–49 average-earnings status, can have no other effect than to stifle any increase in production and discourage research and development.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the basic reasons why I cannot support this bill.

I think the committee could very well have reported out a bill which would increase the revenue from corporations without the unfortunate consequences I fear will result from this legislation. I would, for instance, readily support a bill to produce this revenue by an increase in the normal and surtax rates on corporations.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. This has been discussed before, but I think repetition will not hurt it. Just on the practical basis of the amount of money which could be raised by a bill of this kind with its discriminatory features as compared with a bill laid upon the broad basis of ability to pay, is there any assurance that this bill will raise the amount of money the majority side of the committee hopes it will raise, on the basis of historical experience?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. There seems to be some difference of opinion as to what the natural result of a tax bill of this kind is upon the growth of the economy, which, of course, is the principal factor in producing revenue. In my judgment, the fact that it will stifle production and stifle expansion will definitely have a tendency in the long run to produce less revenue than a much smaller rate with a much smaller impact upon the economy would have. I think it will probably produce the revenue anticipated for the next year or two, as stated in the majority report accompanying this bill. I think it will raise the three and a half or four billion dollars that is claimed for it. However, I think the long-run effect of the legislation can very well be to produce much less revenue than we could obtain from an across-the-board type of tax.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. In my State there was a terrific growth in the population during the years mentioned, and fabulous fortunes were made in buying and selling lands and buildings. I do not see how they can possibly ever make any more than they did during those years.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. And that group of people will not lose one single penny by virtue of this tax bill, will they?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. The gentleman is correct. So far as those people are concerned, for the most part they have a very favorable situation because of a favorable environment from 1946 to 1949. But think of those areas from which those people came, where they had a reduction during 1946–49 as far as their population situation is concerned, and then in the meantime in 1950–51 their population increases. Any increase in income as a result of the population shift now will react to their discredit and they will be penalized as far as their tax situation is concerned by reason of the shift.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I point out also that at the same time there was a larger influx of veterans into our State than into any other State of the Union. I know of half a dozen small companies which were organized by veterans. They struggled along and made very little incomes. There is a field where the points that you have brought out are clearly evident for anyone to see. All those people who fought the war and started businesses are being punished.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that our colleague, Dr. SMITH of Ohio, may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the excess-profits tax, because it is a tax which destroys incentive, and when incentive is gone our productive capacity will just as surely decline. Like all progressive taxation it is wrong because the burden does not merely fall upon those who pay the bill but eventually and inevitably upon production itself.

There is now left only one kind of tax that can be levied to meet existing conditions, namely, a straight across-the-board levy upon all incomes, according to the rule of proportionality and not according to the rule of progression.

The grave crisis in which the United States is now involved is going to be brought home to every one of its citizens. There is no way for any group to evade it.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, before we came back here on November 27 there was some talk about the fact that we would do very little at this session of the Congress, and some talk about the fact that there would be no excess-profits tax legislation passed at all. I think the committee members on both sides, both Republican and Democratic, have done well to bring in an excess-profits-tax bill, and in giving the time, attention, and effort necessary to bring it out now. That is essentially the theme of my remarks today.

The American people, it has been said here many times before, and will be said here many times again, will be called on for greater sacrifices than any they have known in their entire history, either in peace or war, if this totalitarian Communist menace to all man's freedom and opportunity which we are facing today is going to be overcome. And, in my judgment, it will take not less than 10 years to do it, particularly as we are determined to do it if humanly possible without world war III.

The American people, as I have seen them in my own community, and as I think as the other Members have seen them in their communities, during the past campaign, are perfectly willing to expend the effort which this will require and to make the sacrifices which it will take. But they insist on one thing, and we are beginning here today to honor the one thing which they insist on. They insist on equality of sacrifice. Never let us forget that. If the hardships are equally shared, the American people are capable of showing the world such fortitude in the bearing of hardships as the world has never seen. That goes for bombed England in 1941 as well as it goes for any other place where men and women have endured.

I am not one of those who is in a panic about current events, or feels that we are about to descend into an abyss because of our reverses and those of the United Nations in Asia. I believe the American people have the resources and the courage and the strength which is unmatched in the world and which the world has not yet begun to see the beginning of—to meet and overcome reverses. But they do insist on equality of sacrifice, and we are beginning that today, by this excess-profits-tax bill. We are beginning today to bring about that equality of sacrifice upon which the American people insist.

As we go along with this type of tax, which is a step in the pattern of World War II, it may have to be changed. We may have to increase further corporate taxes and if that is not enough, individual and other taxes as well. But this step which we are taking today in passing the excess-profits-tax bill, bearing out as it does this demand of the people that there be equality of sacrifice will show two things.

First, it will show the people that the Congress is on the right road. Second, it will show the world that we propose to meet the issue with determination. The American people are determined to go forward and do this job of winning decisively over communism; they are determined not to give up the leadership of the free world, but, on the contrary, to reassert that leadership more strongly tomorrow than even it is being asserted today, until final victory is achieved. We are beginning here the determined action to match on the home front the heroic sacrifices of our troops in the field.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I remember very well that during the last war I was talking with the manager of a very large hotel in Washington, who informed me that under the tax schedules which were then in effect, his business amounted to that of being practically a tax-collecting agency, as practically all of the money that was taken in in so-called profits went back to the Government as taxes.

That reminds me of the fact that all of the so-called profits of a corporation come from the people either directly or indirectly. It comes in the form of prices of goods and services, or, if it is in connection with sales to the Government, in the form of Government checks drawn on the Public Treasury. Therefore, we can well consider that a corporation is a tax-collecting agency just as much as it is a producing agency, when the tax rates are exceedingly high.

A while ago, when the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] was discussing the defense aspects of this bill, and was joined by several other Members, some very good points were brought out. Since then I have been trying to figure out how we might be able to best consider those corporations that are producing things for the national defense establishment. As was well pointed out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON], there are other companies than aviation manufacturing companies which are engaged exclusively, or almost exclusively, in the manufacturing of defense articles. We all remember that during World War II we had a renegotiation statute, a Contract Renegotiation Act. That Renegotiation Act definitely limited the profits that could be made by any contractor with the Federal Government. There are corporations which are not engaged exclusively in the manufacture of defense items. For example, the General Motors Corp. or the General Electric Corp. or any of those great corporations, like the du Pont Co., and so forth, who make other things than defense items. But it seems to me that under the contract-renegotiation statute, if that should be reenacted, those portions of income which arise from the national defense establishments that are subject to contract renegotiation should be considered as already having been taken care of in the way of taxes, and be subject to whatever normal tax may be in existence at that time. The rest of the business that is done by the corporation should be subject to whatever excess-profits tax the Congress thinks is desirable.

I say that because, as we very well know, the contract-renegotiation officers for the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force generally see to it that there is very little profit left out of a Government contract to be subject to taxes. I do not know whether that suggestion is valuable or not. I am no expert on taxation. We rely upon the distinguished members of this great Committee on Ways and Means, who are supposed to know as much as human beings can know about tax matters. The rest of us, of course, have our own specialties. But when you have a renegotiation statute, and that statute is properly exercised by the officers of the Government, then there is not very much left. If that part were considered separately from the other business of the corporation, it seems to me we would have gone a long way toward solving our difficulties.

I can think of corporations that are engaged in the manufacture of radar equipment, for example, and who do that work exclusively. They do not do anything else. There are companies in the aviation industry which have nothing but Government contracts; then there are other corporations engaged in work for the national defense establishment, let us say, in the aviation industry in which the aviation portion of their manufacturing is a very small proportion of their total business. We could not exempt such concerns from an excess-profits tax just because they happened to do a little aviation business.

I do not know whether these suggestions are any good or not, but I do make the suggestion that these companies that are engaged exclusively, or almost exclusively, in the manufacture of national-defense material, when, as, and if they become subject to the renegotiation statute, then a normal tax would be the proper thing.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. MASON. That proposal was brought before our committee but it was voted down; it was said that we were given a mandate for excess profits and not renegotiation; that that would have to wait until the next session.

Mr. HINSHAW. If that be the case, then I think that under this bill as it stands, and if there be no intention to make changes, then you are going to find very great difficulty if it is possible at all to get these people to risk their capital, whatever they may have, and their personnel, and so forth, in the undertaking exclusively for the national defense establishment; they simply cannot do it and exist under the present bill.

I have not been able to examine the bill which will be offered as a substitute on the motion to recommit. It may be that that bill will accomplish better things, but I hope and trust that in the future when this bill is being considered for amendment by the committee that they will take into consideration these facts that have been brought out here today on both sides of the aisle. It is not possible for these companies to exist under this bill.

Let me now speak for a minute about the bill as a whole. Let us take a great corporation like General Motors, du Pont, or any of the 50 that were mentioned by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia a little bit ago. Those companies are going to get off practically scot-free of any excess-profits tax under this bill. It is the great corporations that have done so well since the war that are going to escape excess-profits taxes under this bill, because many of them, if they take up Government contracts will actually have less profits than they have shown in the 1946–49 base period, and if they drop down to 85 percent of their average profit during 1946–49, then they are not subject to any excess-profits tax at all even though those earnings during those years may be two, five, six times, or as somebody pointed out, 17 times what they were in the years 1936–39. That makes a perfectly ridiculous situation, and it is one that I do not think you can justify to yourselves or to the public. You are favoring the corporation which has been able to make very large profits in the postwar years, and you are damaging to an extent that we cannot now figure, but damaging to a very great extent, in my humble opinion, those companies which have suffered reverses since the war. I do not think that is fair. What you want to do is to have business succeed, and I hear a lot of people talk about little business around this floor. If what you want to have is little business to succeed, then this bill is the wrong bill, because this bill does not favor the growth of little business; it favors the further growth of the biggest and most successful industries in the United States; that is exactly what it does, in my humble opinion. If anybody wants to controvert that, I wish he would take the floor right now and do so. Does anybody want to controvert what I have just said? I hear no controversy; no one arises to controvert what I have said.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. I want the RECORD to show that all of us on this side do not agree with the gentleman's statement that it is in favor of big business; it certainly is not.

Mr. HINSHAW. I said in favor of businesses that made very high base earnings.

Mr. MILLS. During the base period?

Mr. HINSHAW. During the base period.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman mean that the bill itself favors big business?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes, to that extent.

Mr. MILLS. It does not favor big business. It was the representatives of big business who came before the committee urging that we give them 100 percent of the base period as a credit.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is not what I mean.

Mr. MILLS. We have not done that in this bill.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is not what I mean. I do not care what the rate is. I am saying that the bill itself favors those corporations that made the greatest earnings during 1946 to 1949 in relation to their capital investment.

Mr. MILLS. That is necessary if an alternative credit based upon prior average earnings is to be allowed.

Mr. HINSHAW. Then what I said is correct?

Mr. MILLS. I would not agree with the gentleman's conclusions based on that fact.

Mr. HINSHAW. I cannot see anything different from what I have said and I have heard nothing that will controvert it.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, personally I deeply regret that the great people of this country have been unable to hear this debate. As unfriendly as I am to television, this is one debate I would like to have had them see on television. I mean, I would like to have had our people be able to see it and hear the debate.

Mr. Chairman, it is not when I die, but for what purpose I die that counts with me. You may ask, Just what has that to do with a tax bill? Well just this:

For the third time within 33 years we are brought face to face with the problem of financing a war to be fought, at least for the time being, to spill our blood on foreign soil, and to help finance the cost with an excess-profits tax.

Casualties in Korea are running high. We have a great deficit of men. As Russia's war by proxy, by sabotage, by subversion, by revolution spreads, we shall find our manpower deficit will increase, and too, materials will be at a premium. If we can believe the letters and messages which have been sent from the Korean front, certainly many of those lads who have paid the supreme sacrifice did so without knowing for what purpose they died.

Now Mr. Chairman, the big big problem we face is manpower and material, governments can always finance wars.

Our administrators continually tell us that unless we do this, that, and the other thing, that peoples of other lands will not do what they should. These same administrators overlook the fact our people too, are human beings. Psychological laws govern here as in other lands. Our people have likes and dislikes, they are moved by or influenced by incentives. Under our form of government, our method of financing proprietor and corporate capital structures, our method of selecting, training, and handling industrial management; all the labor relations, efficiency of operation, and ultimate production are closely linked to and influenced by tax laws—the same as other peoples are influenced by local and world-wide conditions.

If Russia can precipitate a set of conditions which will destroy or greatly damage our productive system, our financial or capital system, and our profit and loss system, she will move far toward our defeat.

Mr. Chairman, we are not now running a big cash deficit—that may come later—but we have inflation now which is devastating. This because of the excessive demand on the part of the Federal and State governments for scarce men and material which so much of could now be left unused.

This practice of Federal and State governments should be eliminated for the duration. This tax bill as here presented should not be approved. Simply because in 1917 and in World War II excess profits tax laws were approved is in itself no justification for this law. Therefore, if given an opportunity I shall vote to recommit this bill. Let me say that no member of the Ways and Means Committee before the passage of the tax bill of 1950 heard me asking for an excess-profits tax and no Member of the House heard me clamoring for such. I did advocate higher personal-income taxes and how I was criticized by my opponents for that position.

If the House approves the bill, then let it go to the other body. When it comes back I shall then take a look at what is before us in the hope we will have a bill I can personally support.

Insofar as the mandate is concerned, I do not feel that if the judgment of this body is such at the present time that we should not do a certain thing, that a mandate which might have appeared in some previous act, is binding. We are here as representatives of our people with responsibilities on our shoulders, and we are at least subject to bringing our views into agreement with the difficulties which we face at the particular moment. Who had reason to assume before we recessed, based upon the official statements which were continually being made, that we would be in the predicament which we are in today? May I ask the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, in particular those who have talked on this particular subject, Who finances the large aggregations of capital in the form of buildings and machines and machine tools? Only the rich? Oh, no. It is the little man and woman in this country who are striving to get ahead, who live simply, and exercise thrift; who save their money and invest it in these great aggregations of capital. They are the ones you crucify when you stand up here and yell, "Down with the great corporations; let us hook them all we can." Where would you be today in this contest against Russia if you did not have these great industrial plants? Where would you be if you did not have men and women who have guts enough to save the money to pay for those buildings and machinery and machine tools?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Who testified to that?

Mr. CRAWFORD. All I ask the chairman to do is to read the debate of the last 2 days.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Not from anybody I have heard. That is the first time I have heard it mentioned.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will be glad to point it out to the chairman.

I know what I have to do to save a dollar to invest in buildings, machinery, and machine tools so that the man who does not save may have a job with which to feed his family. We have had too much of this stuff going on over this country to the effect that the man who does save and invest should be kicked in the pants and crucified because he did such a thing. That is not fair to the American system or the American way of life. That is exactly what Russia wants us to do, destroy our productive system, destroy our financial system, destroy the capital structures of proprietors and corporations so that they cannot produce, so that a man will have to go back to the field with a hoe on his shoulder, so that we will be rid of the mechanized equipment the laboring people of this country use.

I have no patience with them. I do not owe anything to anybody, and nobody can muzzle me into accepting that kind of approach and not condemning this tax bill, because we will protect this system of ours or we will be wiped off the face of the earth. I do not propose to stand up here and be controlled by any demagoguery that has to do with the destruction of our profit system and that would prevent the accumulation of goods our people need to fight with and to use.

We claim that communism spreads across the face of the earth because the people do not have goods to consume. If we are going to claim that, if we are going to ask our people to fight that Communist philosophy, let us speak a word on behalf of the man who is willing to live simply and exercise thrift and save money and invest it so that goods can be produced and so that we can get buildings and machine tools and machinery together. Let us see that that system is protected and pass tax laws to protect our people and keep this thing tied together like a bundle of sticks so that we will have some strength. I am one of those who believes that our enemy fears our capacity to produce more than he fears our military forces. I am against any man or law which would destroy our productive system or our method of financing our capital goods.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman—

The power to tax is the power to destroy,
The New Deal is on the destructive road,
begoy.

Mr. Chairman, I have voted for about 18 tax bills since I came to Congress. I voted for a majority of them because I thought they were necessary to raise funds in order to keep this country going, at a time when the administration we had in power was spending so much money that I realized we could not afford to wreck this country. I had no idea they would keep up spending and spending. However, during this last session of Congress, before the recess, I refused to vote for another tax bill until we got some economy in government, and I am not going to vote for this tax bill.

I think it is high time we as Members of Congress get a little common sense and start to economize in government rather than tax the people to the point where they are taxed to death and destroyed. I do not propose to do that. I think I am taking the wise and sensible course as a sound businessman and as a Member of Congress when I follow that procedure.

How in the world can you expect to tax and tax and tax and expect the people of this country to pay and pay and pay if you are going to ruin them? It just does not happen that way.

To be sensible, in your own home and in your own business when you find that you are spending more money than you are getting as income, what do you do?

When you start to economize in the operation of your home and in the operation of your business you do not keep on spending and spending and spending. You economize—and that is the thing that I want to drive home to the Congress today. We need economy in the operation of the Government. Nobody knows that better than the chairman of this committee. I feel sorry for him today because he is being driven by the administration which causes him to do things which he knows in his heart are wrong. He knows that this is wrong. I know it is wrong.

Consider the bill we have here today. When I listened to the statements that have been made on the floor of the House by some of the Members of Congress to the effect that this bill was written by people on the outside who sent the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, I think that is a deplorable condition when we come up with a tax bill which we know is not the kind of tax bill which we ought to have. Why was not a stopping point or termination date put on the collection of these taxes? Why was this not limited to 1 year or 2 years or 3 years? Instead, it will go on and on. What you are going to do is to wreck this country. You are going to wreck the private enterprise system if you put this bill into effect. God save America, when you get into socialism. You are doing what Hitler did when he came into power in Germany. You started to put this country under the control of the administration in power, and you have been doing that for the last 15 years. Now you have us to the point where we will have a socialistic government or a military government. If you ever get to that point, God save America.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. STEFAN. Does the gentleman know how much money will be collected under this bill if it goes into effect?

Mr. RICH. No; I do not know how much money this bill will bring in, but I know that when you take practically all the money that a corporation makes, you will be putting that corporation in bankruptcy and you will be placing more corporations in bankruptcy than you are going to collect money over a period of 4 or 5 years.

Mr. STEFAN. I understand the amount to be collected as a result of this bill if it goes into effect in its present form, including all the other revenues of Government, during fiscal year 1951, will be approximately $47,000,000,000. I understand that the expenditures for the fiscal year 1951, including the hold-overs and permanent appropriations, such as the public debt, will amount to $61,307,000,000. Added to that will be the $18,000,000,000 recently requested. In other words, your expenditures will be around $80,000,000,000 and your receipts $47,000,000,000. Where are you going to get the other $33,000,000,000 deficit.

Mr. RICH. I do not know where you are going to get the money, unless you economize in Government spending. That is the point I want to emphasize here. We want a little economy in Government. We want a little sensible Government, and an administration that is going to stop this spending. Look at the Truman administration. In 4 or 5 years they have spent more than all of the other administrations up to World War II. Why, it is a crime and a shame. It is slow suicide. It is time we did something about it. God save America if you are going to put this tax bill through. You will have socialism take over where freedom and liberty reigned.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] made this statement before the House yesterday:

Mr. Chairman, we have before us for debate and action a "pig in a poke" because not one Member of this House can possibly know what is in this bill. Anyone voting for it under those circumstances must close his eyes, hold his nose, and hope for the best when he votes.

Mr. Chairman, if this tax bill goes into effect with no termination date for the imposition of these taxes, it means the end of the free-enterprise system. It means socialism in America, and the destruction of our form of government. We need economy in government. Stop spending—little lending—and no giving. That should be the motto from this time forth.

Just let me give you a list of the taxes being forced upon the American people, and see if such taxes are not a destructive force oppressing our citizens and raising the high cost of living and causing us to bend our backs to support an incompetent Government. As for me I expect to vote to recommit this bill. I shall never vote for a bill of this kind, which will tax us into socialism. Just look at the taxes we are paying:

TAXES, 1950

Income taxes, estate taxes, gift taxes, corporation income tax, corporation excess-profits taxes.

Liquor taxes: Taxes on distilled spirits, domestic and imported; tax on fermented malt liquors; wine taxes; special taxes in connection with liquor occupations; container stamp taxes.

Tobacco taxes: Tax on cigarettes; tax on tobacco, chewing and smoking; tax on cigars; tax on snuff; tax on cigarette papers and tubes.

Stamp taxes: Issues of securities, bond transfers, and deeds of conveyance; stock transfers; playing cards; silver bullion sales or transfers.

Manufacturers' excise taxes: Gasoline tax; lubricating oils tax; passenger automobiles and motorcycles tax; automobile trucks, busses, and trailers tax; parts and accessories for automobiles tax; tires and inner tubes tax; electric energy tax; electric, gas, and oil appliances tax; electric light bulbs tax; radio receiving sets, phonographs, phonograph records, and musical instruments tax; refrigerators, refrigerating apparatus, and air conditioners tax; business and store machines tax; photographic-apparatus tax; matches tax; sporting-goods tax; pistols and revolvers tax; luggage tax; jewelry and so forth tax; furs tax; toilet preparations tax; luggage, handbags, wallets, and so forth tax.

Miscellaneous excise taxes: Telephone, telegraph, radio, and cable facilities, leased wires, and so forth; local telephone service; transportation of oil by pipeline; transportation of persons; transportation of property; admissions; cabarets, roof gardens, and so forth; club dues and initiation fees; leases of safe-deposit boxes; coconut and other vegetable oils processed; oleomargarine and so forth; sugar tax; coin-operated amusement and gaming devices; bowling alleys and billiard and pool tables.

Employment taxes: Federal Insurance Contributions Act—social security; Federal Unemployment Tax Act; Railroad Retirement Tax Act; Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Sales tax, death tax, gift tax, inheritance, property tax, occupation tax, bank tax, dog tax, documentary and transfer tax.

Taxes are wrecking United States economy.

Oh, save us from the destructive taxes.

Stop spending, little lending, and no giving and you will not have to tax, tax, tax.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Montana [Mr. D'EWART].

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Chairman, for some years the mining of minerals and metals in the United States has been an exceedingly risky venture at best. Such is doubly true of those daring to open new mines or expand production.

One of the principal objectives of the Defense Production Act is to encourage the exploration, development, and mining of strategic and critical minerals and metals. Government participation in the form of financial assistance to private enterprise for exploration and development work, above-market prices to marginal operations, and liberal loans are necessary to expand the production of strategic and critical minerals and metals in the United States.

The scarcity of minerals and metals from domestic mines is the most limiting factor in our economy today—just as it will be throughout and following the emergency now upon us. Drastic cutbacks in the civilian consumption of copper, zinc, and aluminum already have been made. Not only is the scarcity of minerals and metals a limiting factor in our economy, but after two years or more of an all-out war emergency, the scarcity of these materials would limit and delay the war production program, and adversely affect the defense of the United States.

On the one hand we have our Government alarmed over the scarcity of minerals and metals from domestic mines and embarking on a program, inadequate as it may be, to increase exploration, development, and mining of domestic mineral deposits, and on the other hand we have our Government proposing a method of taxation which tends to inhibit the exploration, development, and mining of minerals and metals in the United States.

Section 448 of the proposed law, entitled "Corporations engaged in mining of strategic minerals" exempts corporations engaged in the mining of 14 listed minerals and metals from the proposed tax. Such provision is fine and sensible as far as it goes.

Platinum, tin, and tantalum are among the 14 minerals and metals listed for exemption, yet there are no known deposits of these 3 metals in the United States capable of economic exploitation, and it appears extremely unlikely that any such deposits of consequence will be discovered. The domestic production of platinum is derived as a byproduct of copper-smelting operations. Vermiculite, which is listed for exemption, has not been regarded as a strategic material in recent years, if ever. It is used primarily as a building material for insulation, acoustical plasters, and lightweight concrete.

Primary consideration currently is being given under the Defense Production Act to expand the production of a number of scarce minerals and metals not listed for exemption from the tax proposed by H. R. 9827. These scarce materials include copper, zinc, cobalt, molybdenum, asbestos, corundum, talc, and sulfur.

It appears wholly illogical, inconsistent, and detrimental to the needs of the economy and defense production program of the United States to exclude copper, lead, zinc, bauxite, and all other strategic, critical, and essential minerals and metals from the exemption provided under section 448 of the proposed law. The bill should be amended to incorporate such exemptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, just to clarify the situation after this very heated debate which, in some instances, has sunk to a lower level than we would like, at any rate I want to get this issue clear.

Yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury, testifying before another body, said that the proposal in the House bill fell one billion short of what the President had asked for to meet this emergency. We are meeting that challenge directly.

So I say to you that to more effectively take the profits out of war, to raise additional revenue, and to combat the rising cost of living, the Republicans will move that H. R. 9827 be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report it back forthwith with two simple amendments, to provide—

(a) That the corporate surtax be raised by 5 percentage points; and

(b) That the average earnings credit be 100 percent instead of 85 percent.

The Republican motion should be adopted for the following reasons:

First. It will raise at least $500,000,000 more revenue than H. R. 9827.

At a $40,000,000,000 level of corporate profits, the Republican proposal will yield approximately $3,500,000,000, $500,000,000 more than the $3,000,000,000 estimated under H. R. 9827. At a $48,000,000,000 corporate profits level the Republican proposal will yield approximately $6,400,000,000—$1,800,000,000 more than the $4,600,000,000 estimated under H. R. 9827.

Second. It will substantially reduce the hardships and discriminations in H. R. 9827 and at the same time will spread the increased tax load more equitably.

I remind you when you go home tonight to listen to the radio. Go back to your people. Then your conscience will tell you whether or not in this ghastly Korean crisis you should increase this amount rather than whittle it down as you Democrats are proposing to do.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

EXCESS-PROFITS TAXATION

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the Ways and Means Committee on carrying out the mandate of this House as indicated in a record vote shortly before we took the fall recess. The bill, of course, does not go as far as I should like to have it go, but I have confidence that in the next session we are going to eliminate the loopholes and provide ways and means of taxing those who can best afford to pay additional taxes.

There was an almost universal appeal by the people of this country to reinstitute the excess-profits tax in connection with the greatly increased demands of our national defense program. Since that time our national defense has approached virtual all-out-war proportions. Our defense requirements have skyrocketed. Yes, unfortunately, the situation has become infinitely more critical in the week or 10 days since the Committee on Ways and Means commenced the preparation of the final bill now before us. Of course, the revenue to be raised by this measure will hardly touch the outlay that is necessary to meet our present crisis, and another bill greatly expanding the tax structure must be forthcoming within a matter of months or even weeks.

The usual hue and cry against excess-profits taxation is heard over and over again in the press, on the radio, before the Ways and Means Committee, and in the telegrams and letters that come from big business to every Member of this body. These are old and worn-out cries to me. I well remember the howl big business put up in 1917, when World War I was thrust upon us, and the proposal to institute an excess-profits tax was debated in this body. The charge was made and repeated and repeated, that it would result in the total collapse of our American economic system, as reiterated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] a few months ago, that it would destroy business—that it was confiscatory and discriminatory—that it threw the entire burden of paying for the war on one segment of our economy. The bill was passed. We collected great sums from those best able to pay. When the war was over, the tax was repealed and business went along as usual. There was not the slightest sign of any hardship generally. No one was hurt.

Again, when the Japs struck at Pearl Harbor and World War II was launched, the Congress enacted another excess-profits tax. Once more, big business put forth every ounce of its power to defeat the proposal, but it was enacted into law. Following the cessation of hostilities in 1945, business returned to its normal processes, the tax repealed through the great efforts of the gentlemen who always give ear to the $1,000,000 profiteers, and we witnessed one of the most remarkable reconversions from war to peace time operation the world has ever seen. Big business was not injured by the tax, but again tremendous sums were siphoned off from the huge war profits and converted toward the cost of the struggle we had successfully completed.

What is the situation today? For several years prior to our entrance into the defense of little Korea, the record shows profits of the large corporations greater than in all history. Here are some interesting figures on the profits of a dozen or so of the giant corporations for the years 1948 and 1949:

Profits and more profits

	1949	1948
General Motors	$502,414,000	$327,155,000
United States Steel	133,223,000	88,042,000
Chrysler	97,651,000	59,888,000
Bethlehem Steel	82,898,000	53,184,000
Du Pont	49,188,230	38,960,000
International Harvester	37,500,000	28,500,000
American Tobacco	34,009,000	29,038,000
Deere & Co	28,108,000	17,490,000
National Biscuit	23,779,000	20,799,000
General Foods	21,349,000	20,432,000
Anaconda Copper	20,828,000	13,606,000
National Dairy	16,537,000	13,325,000
Allis-Chalmers	13,494,000	9,870,000
Caterpillar Tractor	10,942,000	3,763,000

You will note that these profits were topped by General Motors' profit for 1949 of over $502,000,000, the greatest in all the history of this giant corporation. In fact, figures released by the National City Bank of New York just recently show that 1950 profits will exceed those of 1949 by over $10,000,000,000. These are not my figures; they come from the big banking interest which represents big business.

The expansion of Federal expenditures for defense as a result of the very serious international crisis confronting our Nation, makes it imperative that the tax load be properly and proportionately shared by corporations exacting these fantastic profits. With our national debt approaching $260,000,000,000, it is likewise imperative that present costs of defense be placed on a pay-as-you-go basis as fully as possible. Every segment of our economy will be required to bear its share of the burden. Individual incomes have already been required to contribute their share, effective last November 1. With profits as of July 1 having risen to the fantastic figure of $37,400,000,000—with the present total for 1950 estimated at over $42,000,000,000—it is imperative that a substantial excess-profits tax be levied effective July 1, 1950, to siphon off these huge profits which are contributing so greatly to the growing forces of inflation. Are we to squeeze out every available dollar from the pockets of the average workingman on the theory of controlling inflation and diverting dollars to the war cost, while permitting these giant corporations to wax richer by the hour and expanding the real dangers of inflation during these dark hours?

My only criticism of this bill now before us is that it does not go far enough. The bill should be amended to produce the full amount requested by President Truman weeks ago. His estimates, made weeks before the present tremendously critical situation was before us, were modest at that time. They are wholly inadequate today. There cannot be the slightest doubt that what we do here today will be but an extremely temporary and inadequate effort to cope with the grave problem now confronting us. We can ease the burden bearing down upon us by increasing the rates in this bill to at least those necessary to bring in the revenue the President asked for. There is less uncertainty today about Federal spending for defense than there was 2 or 3 months ago. The tempo of our preparations for defense are being doubled, trebled, quadrupled overnight. Taxes must inevitably follow. Let us not lag too far behind in providing the revenues necessary to meet this load. Let us not quibble over its effects on business 2, 3, 5, 10 years hence. All of these problems can and will be met, as they were after each of our two recent world cataclysms, with little or no effect upon our continued expansion and development.

This excess-profits tax, as with all taxes, is but a means of distributing the burdens, the doing without, which war and preparedness for war put on the economy. Big business has a right to express itself, to argue that the shift in the burden as proposed is confiscatory. Unfortunately, their stand has been inscribed on the record of the proceedings of Congress during two great wars, and has been found completely wanting.

Prior to World War II the charge was made that an excess-profits tax would seriously interfere with production and the expansion of production during the war period. What happened? During the war steel production expanded 10 percent, electric power more than 20 percent, and aluminum production by more than 500 percent. In considering this experience, it should be remembered that the financial strength of corporations to expand production capacity and production was far less during the war than it is now. Financial strength was low because corporations as a whole had experienced losses in the decade 1930–39. Production levels before the war were less than half those of the war period; profits after taxes during the four prewar years were no more in total than the profits after taxes of the one postwar year 1948.

Notwithstanding the excess-profits tax of the last war period, industry was able to reconvert and expand its production at the most fabulous rate in all history. Profits reached unheard-of peaks. The dire forebodings of disaster following the end of the war were dissipated in thin air. There is no sound, logical argument against an adequate excess-profits tax.

Business has come forward with a proposal to increase the corporation income tax. An increase in this tax would not divert sufficient of the productive capacity needed for the armaments program, and would encourage putting machinery, buildings, and materials into uses from which they would have to be diverted eventually, with resulting waste and loss. Smaller business which would be subjected to the increased rate would find it harder to expand out of reinvested earnings than if there were an excess-profits tax to which they were not subject. Both the desirability and possibility of expansion would be less.

An excess-profits tax curbs inflation and prevents the inequitable distribution of the burdens of armament programs. The World War II excess-profits tax brought in as much as $11,000,000,000 in 1 year; this bill is estimated to produce but $3,400,000,000. It will still leave large profits to the corporations—too large profits. Corporate profits after taxes would still be more than half again as large as during the war, and larger than in 1946.

The tax is anti-inflationary also because it reduces the incentive to raise prices to take advantage of market conditions. Cost cutting can occur. An excess-profits tax encourages greater efficiency and cost cutting. It encourages profit making by holding down costs. The carelessness that is inherent in big business in normal times, in taking the easy road of raising prices rather than by cutting costs to ensure huge profits, will disappear.

Another sound reason for a substantial excess-profits tax has been advanced by Secretary Snyder when he says:

> There is substantial variation in the increased profitability of small and large corporations. There are equally important variations among industries and among firms within identical industries. As happened during the last war, these variations will undoubtedly increase under the abnormal conditions ahead of us.

The excess-profits tax bears only on those corporations which obtain high profits out of a defense or war program. During World War II it was paid by only about one in five or six corporations having net income. One percent of all corporations paid about 69 percent of the tax. The tax is paid primarily by large corporations, by those best able to pay.

To increase the corporate income tax would only shift the burden to the average wage earner. One great industry that would be affected is the electric and gas utilities. Their profits are high, but are rather stable, being dependent upon rates controlled by State commissions, while the profits of industrial corporations are not so controlled and have shown increases as much as 53 percent in one quarter. Any increase in the corporate-tax structure in lieu of excess profits levied on public utilities and other public-service corporations, such as transportation, would immediately result in increased charges to the average home owner and workingman and his family, thus distorting the equitable distribution of the necessary tax load.

There has been an alarming tendency since World War II to depend more and more on taxes on consumers and less and less on taxes based on ability to pay. The tax increases proposed in this bill are not only not high enough but are not excessive in the light of the continued high level of corporate profits since 1945. Profits for the current year will be only slightly less than the $21,000,000,000 in profits after taxes by corporations in 1948, which was an all-time high.

Enactment of this proposed excess-profits tax now would give balance to the tax structure; it would constitute a necessary support to efforts to check inflationary tendencies; it will provide badly needed revenue; and it will constitute no excessive burden on corporate taxpayers, who at the current level of economic activity would continue to operate with very high earnings and at a high rate of return.

I sincerely trust that when the Committee on Ways and Means brings in the next tax bill, which is certain to follow this one, it will make specific provision for closing all of the loopholes that now exist in our tax structure; that it will include an adequate tax on insurance companies; that it will eliminate the depletion allowances granted to the oil and natural gas industries which are rolling in wealth now. It should provide for the proper taxation of the many family and so-called charitable trusts, as well as those educational trusts which compete with private business for profit but have successfully avoided their share of the tax burden. The millions of bondholders who have invested billions of savings in enterprise are entitled to protection against these tax-dodgers. We must safeguard the investment of these conscientious investors, most of whom are dependent upon the income from these investments for their very livelihood and well-being. No loopholes must be left open. All profit-makers must bear their share of the burdens ahead.

I am confident the membership of this House will measure up to its responsibility and enact this legislation overwhelmingly.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL].

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, as we conclude the debate on this important piece of legislation it appears that seldom is the House given an opportunity to pass tax legislation—at least in recent times—except under great duress. For example, on June 28—and I mention this to you for the purpose of showing how events shape taxation legislation—on June 28 we passed a billion-dollar excise-tax-reduction bill; that was 3 days after Korea. At that time some of us had much concern as to whether we were taking the proper course, but as that bill moved over into the Senate, what happened? The other body knocked out the tax reduction that we gave, and increased the income taxes of the people. The Senate took from the little people of this Nation almost $3,000,000,000 by increasing personal income taxes. At the same time the Senate increased corporation taxes, obtaining a billion and a half dollars in revenue from that source.

Let us take a look at the economy of the Nation at that time. In this year 1950, every quarter has shown an increase in the national income; every quarter has shown great increases in corporate profits.

When the members of the Ways and Means Committee came back on November 14, the newspapers, yes, and some of the leading economists and nearly all business came before us and said: "Do not put a tax upon excess war profits." What they tried to do was to sell us the same bill of goods as the minority is now trying to insert in the motion to recommit. They said, in substance, "Increase the corporate tax rate but do not take war profits away from us."

It is these people—and I refer to the National Association of Manufacturers and other special interest groups—who call the loudest for us to fight the menace of communism; yet these same groups, when they are confronted with a situation which threatens their war profits, are reluctant to practice what they preach. They are unwilling to make a personal sacrifice. I say to you that this is a time for equality of sacrifice. This is no time for any group to shirk its fair share of the load.

Do we consult the wives, the mothers and fathers, and the sweethearts of those who are being called upon to take up arms in defense of our democracy? They have no high-priced lawyers or experts to gain exemptions or find loopholes for them. We are so concerned with protecting corporations—what protection is being given to the families of these men? Already they are being caught in an economic trap, crushed between rising prices on the one hand and higher taxes on the other. I say to you, this cannot be a one-way street; the people cannot be expected to make all the sacrifices while the big corporations reap excessive war profits.

It is significant that all the economists and others who appeared representing the special groups said to us: "We must increase the taxes of the people."

I asked some of our own experts before I took the floor today how much more personal income taxes can be raised. Well, they said we can make certain increases. We can lower the present $600 exemption to $500. We can increase their taxes 3 percent or thereabouts. We can do away with exemptions for certain groups. Then, when we get through, we will have an additional $4,000,000,000. That is all the additional taxation that the people can bear.

I notice the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] put in the RECORD yesterday figures on the increase in the cost of living. May I say to my friends on the Democratic side as I prepare to leave this body: You had better pay some attention to what is happening to the economy of this Nation. Every week and every month prices are spiraling upward, and in addition money is being taken away from the people by an increase in taxation. In this grave period, this Nation is confronted not only by the war danger from aggression of the Soviet Union and the Chinese Reds, but the equally great danger of uncontrolled inflation.

Let me make this further point, and and I think it is relatively simple. We are going to get only a comparatively small amount of revenue out of this bill. In order to get a bill before you and to meet the mandate given this committee, we had to compromise and compromise and give and give, allowing great relief provisions in this bill. This is not the best bill that could have been brought before this body. The minority did not want to strengthen the bill. They wanted to weaken it further—make no mistake about that.

I wish to mention another very important point. This legislation does have an anti-inflationary aspect. The economists who came before us said: "If you are going to stop inflation, you will have to reach into the pockets of the people and take the money away from them." But, as I have pointed out, there is a definite limit to the amount of money which can be gained in that way.

In my area, in the small towns of my State, the people are complaining about price increases. In addition, they are complaining about the increase in the withholding tax that we recently imposed upon them. The wage earner, the white-collar worker, the aged, and others on fixed incomes—these people cannot stand another dose of inflation. I think it would be a very serious mistake for any Member of the Democratic group, and, yes, those thinking Members on the Republican side, to fail to vote for this measure.

Not long ago we appropriated $17,000,000,000 for the military. We did that in a period of increasing profits; we did that in a period of an expanding national income. Today we are asked to appropriate an additional $18,000,000,000. What is going to be the effect of that expenditure? You mark what I say to you. Within 3 or 4 months' time you will not only have to act on additional taxes, you will have to impose controls to protect the fixed-income groups of this country. As the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] said, we are in one of the most critical periods of American history. Yet from the testimony of the witnesses who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee one would think there was no great emergency. All of those witnesses were arguing that you must not interfere with payrolls, you must not interfere with war profits.

Now, in substance here is what we have done by this bill. We are going to cut into some corporation profits about 15 percent—a very, very mild provision. The Treasury recommended 25 percent. In order to bring the bill in at all, we had to compromise; so we agreed upon 15 percent. Instead of getting a $4,000,000,000 bill, you have a $3,000,000,000 bill. I certainly hope that no one here will pay any attention to this motion to recommit, which is a sham and a subterfuge on the part of those who did not want an excess-profits tax in the first place. In the next 3 or 4 months you are going to have to meet far more serious problems than the bill that is before you now, and you must have the courage and the will to act in the national interest. I wish to take this opportunity to thank our chairman the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] and other members of the Committee on Ways and Means for their fine work on this bill. They have listened to the mandate given the Committee on Ways and Means by this body. In addition, I wish to say that had it not been for the valiant fight of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER], and others who supported him, there would have been no bill to tax the excessive war profits of the calendar year 1950.

Before I close, I want to say to the other body that it can write a better bill than we have written; it can write a tougher bill than we have written; it can write a more equitable bill than we have written; it can take more of the war profits away from those who are profiting so greatly from the present emergency. Let me tell you, every day they are getting contracts ranging up to $100,000,000 or $150,000,000. Somebody has to curb these war profits, and this legislation is a step in the right direction. I sincerely hope that every Democrat will stand back of the Committee on Ways and Means and the exceptional work it has done under the circumstances. I urge that you vote down the motion to recommit and vote for the passage of this bill.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, we have no further requests for time.

Mr. REED of New York. We have no further requests, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the bill is considered as read. Committee amendments are in order.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I have a series of seven committee amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered as read and printed in the RECORD, and considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments are as follows:

"(M) Blocked foreign income: There shall be excluded income derived from sources within any foreign country to the extent that such income would, but for monetary, exchange, or other restrictions imposed by such foreign country, have been includible in the gross income of the taxpayer for any taxable year which preceded its first taxable year under this subchapter. The determination of the extent to which income so derived shall be considered to have been includible, but for such restrictions, in the gross income of the taxpayer for years which preceded its first taxable year under this subchapter shall be made under regulations prescribed by the Secretary. Where income derived from sources within any foreign country is includible (without regard to this sentence) in a taxable year succeeding the first taxable year under this subchapter, and but for monetary, exchange, or other restrictions imposed by such foreign country would have been includible in the gross income of the taxpayer for its first taxable year under this subchapter, such income, in case such first taxable year began before July 1, 1950, shall be considered (in the application of this subparagraph) as having been includible in gross income of a taxable year which preceded such first taxable year in an amount equal to that portion of such income as the number of days prior to July 1, 1950, in such first taxable year bears to the total number of days in such first taxable year. Deductions properly chargeable and allocable to income included under this subparagraph shall not be allowed."

Committee amendment No. 2: Page 72, line 5, strike out "average of the."

Committee amendment No. 3: Page 73, line 7, strike out "defined in section 437 (b)" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "computed under section 437 (b) without regard to the last sentence thereof."

Committee amendment No. 4: Page 73, line 17, insert after "telephone service," the following: "telegraph service."

Committee amendment No. 5: Page 73, line 20, strike out "(2)" and insert "(3)."

Page 74, after line 5, insert the following:

"(2) 6 percent in the case of a corporation engaged as a common carrier in the furnishing or sale of transportation by pipe line of oil or gas, if subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Power Commission."

Page 74, line 6, strike out "(2)" and insert "(3)."

Page 74, strike out lines 13 to 15, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(d) For the purpose of this subchapter the term 'regulated public utility' means a corporation described in subsection (c) substantially all of whose excess profits net income for the taxable year is derived from sources described in subsection (c)."

Committee amendment No. 6: Page 75, strike out line 20 and all that follows through line 5 on page 76 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Exemption from tax: In the case of any domestic corporation engaged in the mining of a strategic mineral or a critical mineral, the portion of the adjusted excess-profits net income attributable to such mining in the United States shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subchapter. The tax on the remaining portion of such adjusted excess-profits net income shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to the tax computed without regard to this section as such remaining portion bears to the entire adjusted excess-profits net income.

"(b) Definitions: For the purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'strategic mineral' means antimony, chromite, manganese, nickel, platinum (including the platinum group metals), quicksilver, sheet mica, tantalum, tin, tungsten, vanadium, fluorspar, flake graphite, vermiculite, long-fiber asbestos in the form of amosite, chrysotile or crocidolite, beryl, cobalt, columbite, corundum, diamonds, kyanite (if equivalent in grade to Indian kyanite), monazite, quartz crystals, and uranium, and any other mineral which the certifying agency has certified to the Secretary as being essential to the defense effort of the United States and as not having been normally produced in appreciable quantities within the United States.

"(2) the term 'critical mineral' means a mineral (other than a strategic mineral) (A) which the certifying agency has certified to the Secretary that additional production thereof within the United States is essential for the defense effort, and (B) which is mined from—

"(i) a mineral property which was developed and brought into production subsequent to June 25, 1950; or

"(ii) a mineral property which has been in production prior to June 25, 1950, but was not in production on such date; or

"(iii) a mineral property from which, during the period it was in production during 1946, 1947, 1948, and 1949, the aggregate gross income derived therefrom was less than the aggregate of the deductions (allowable under section 23 without regard to any net operating loss deduction) attributable to such property during such period of production.

"(3) the term 'certifying agency' means the department, official, corporation, or agency utilized or created to carry out the authority of the President under section 303 (a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 to make provision for the encouragement of exploration, development, and mining of critical and strategic minerals and metals.

"(c) Certification during taxable year of taxpayer: In determining under subsection (a) the portion of the adjusted excess profits net income which is attributable to the mining of a mineral which is a strategic or critical mineral by reason of a certification made during the taxable year, such portion shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to the portion of the adjusted excess profits net income, determined without regard to this subsection, attributable to such mining during the entire taxable year as the number of days for which the taxpayer held the mineral property during the taxable year and after the date of the making of the certification bears to the number of days for which the taxpayer held the property during such taxable year.

"(d) Application of section to lessor: In the case of a mining property operated under a lease, income attributable to such property derived by a lessor corporation shall, for the purposes of this section, be considered to be income of a corporation engaged in mining."

Committee amendment No. 7: Page 94, strike out line 14 and all that follows down through line 2 on page 95.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD in brief explanation of the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Committee amendment No. 1: This amendment deals with the treatment for excess-profits-tax purposes of blocked foreign income. United States corporations engaged in foreign operations have been unable to return from many foreign countries a substantial part of the income earned in those countries because of monetary, exchange, or other restrictions imposed by the foreign countries. In many cases income so blocked is reported for tax purposes in the taxable year when the income is convertible into dollars, instead of in the taxable year in which the income was actually earned. This amendment provides that the excess-profits tax shall not apply to income which, but for monetary restrictions imposed by a foreign country, would have been reportable for tax purposes for a period prior to the excess-profits-tax years.

Committee amendments Nos. 2 and 3: These are technical amendments to correct technical errors in the bill as reported.

Committee amendment No. 4: This amendment inserts a reference to telegraph service, to correct an inadvertent omission in the provisions of the bill dealing with regulated public utilities.

Committee amendment No. 5: This amendment inserts a reference to common carriers of oil and gas by pipe line, thereby extending to such carriers the provisions of the bill dealing with regulated public utilities.

Committee amendment No. 6: This amendment deals with the exemption from the excess-profits tax of income attributable to the mining of strategic and critical minerals. Under the World War II excess-profits-tax law, income derived from the mining of strategic minerals was exempt from the tax. The bill as reported contained the provisions of the old law. This amendment adds other minerals to the list of strategic minerals which your committee believes to be in the category of strategic minerals. The amendment extends the same treatment to minerals not specifically named in the bill upon certification by the Defense Minerals Administration as being strategic or critical minerals. In the case of critical minerals, however, the certification applies only in respect of mining from—

(i) a mineral property which was developed and brought into production subsequent to June 25, 1950; or

(ii) a mineral property which has been in production prior to June 25, 1950, but was not in production on such date; or

(iii) a mineral property from which, during the period it was in production during 1946, 1947, 1948, and 1949, the aggregate gross income derived therefrom was less than the aggregate of the deductions (allowable under section 23, without regard to any net operating loss deduction) attributable to such property during such period of production.

Committee amendment No. 7: This amendment corrects a technical mistake in drafting to conform the bill with the policy agreed upon in the committee.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendments.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to call the attention of the House to this series of technical amendments. It just goes to show the House the lack of consideration given to this bill. The provisions in it were so inequitable, so unsound, so unjust that now we find the committee in the last minute trying to correct their failures in bringing out this bill so lacking in its essentials. If they wanted to perfect this bill at all, they would be in here not with seven amendments; they would be in here with 50 amendments or more. That is not the way to legislate. So you can see that while this may make some slight improvement, this is only just a little bit of the work which should have been done by the committee before it came into this House and asked this House to support this bill.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that each of these seven amendments were considered by the Committee on Ways and Means and adopted by the committee and turned over to the drafting service to draft the amendments. The amendments are presented here for the purpose of carrying out the action taken by the committee during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentlemen from Tennessee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

Mr. COOPER. There are no further amendments, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 872, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. REED of New York. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. REED of New York moves to recommit the bill H. R. 9827 to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report it back forthwith with the following amendments:

"(1) Strike out the figure '85%' in sections 435 (a) (I) (A) and 435 (a) (2) of H. R. 9827, and insert in lieu thereof the figure '100%.'

"(2) That the following new section be added at the end of title II of the bill:

" 'SEC. 206. Increase of corporate surtax rate.

" 'Section 15 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code, relating to rates of corporate surtax, is hereby amended to read as follows:

" ' "(b) Imposition of tax:

" ' "(1) Taxable years beginning after June 30, 1950: In the case of taxable years beginning after June 30, 1950, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the corporation surtax net income of every corporation (except a corporation subject to a tax imposed by section 231 (a), Supplement G, or Supplement Q) a surtax of 25 percent of the amount of the corporation surtax net income in excess of $25,000.

" ' "(2) Calendar year 1950: In the case of a taxable year beginning on January 1, 1950, and ending on December 31, 1950, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for such taxable year upon the corporation surtax net income of every corporation (except a corporation subject to a tax imposed by section 231 (a), Supplement G, or Supplement Q) a surtax of 21½ percent of the amount of the corporation surtax net income in excess of $25,000.

" ' "(3) Other taxable years beginning before July 1, 1950: In the case of taxable years (other than the calendar year 1950, to which paragraph (2) applies) beginning before July 1, 1950, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the corporation surtax net income of every corporation (except a Western Hemisphere trade corporation as defined in section 109, and except a corporation subject to a tax imposed by section 231 (a), Supplement G, or Supplement Q) a surtax as follows:

" ' "(A) Surtax net incomes not over $25,000: Upon corporation surtax net incomes not over $25,000, 6 percent of the amount thereof.

" ' "(B) Surtax net incomes over $25,000 but not over $50,000: Upon corporation surtax net incomes over $25,000, but not over $50,000, $1,500 plus 22 percent of the amount of the corporation surtax net income over $25,000.

" ' "(C) Surtax net incomes over $50,000: Upon corporation surtax net incomes over $50,000, 14 percent of the corporation surtax net income.

For computation of tax in case the taxable year ends after June 30, 1950, see section 108 (f)." ' "

Mr. REED of New York (interrupting the reading of the motion to recommit). Mr. Speaker, in order to save the time of the House at this late hour, may I say that I have explained to the House the purpose of this motion to recommit and I think everybody understands it. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the motion to recommit be dispensed with.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to know if the motion has been technically drawn.

Mr. REED of New York. Yes, it is technically drawn, more so than your bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 145, nays 252, answered "present" 1, not voting 31, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS ON TAX BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

GRANTING PRIVILEGE OF BECOMING NATURALIZED CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 874, Rept. No. 3149), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9780) providing the privilege of becoming a naturalized citizen of the United States to all aliens having a legal right to permanent residence. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO ATTEND COMMONWEALTH ASSOCIATION IN AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 105.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are authorized to appoint four Members of the Senate and four Members of the House of Representatives, respectively, to attend the next general meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association to be held in Australia or New Zealand and to designate the chairmen of the delegations from each of the Houses to be present at such meeting. The expenses incurred by the members of the delegations and staff appointed for the purpose of carrying out this concurrent resolution shall not exceed $10,000 for each of the delegations and shall be reimbursed to them from the contingent fund of the House of which they are Members, upon submission of vouchers approved by the chairman of the delegation of which they are members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, I understand this resolution has already been passed by the Senate and must be passed by the House at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. RICHARDS. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VELDE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

INDICTMENT OF STEVE NELSON, DR. JOSEPH W. WEINBERG, ET AL.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, November 30, I made the statement that I was going to ask for time this week to give in detail points concerning Steve Nelson and Dr. Joseph W. Weinberg, commonly known as Scientist X. These two men were among those cited by the House of Representatives last August 10, 1950, for refusal to answer questions by the House Un-American Activities Committee. There was an overwhelming vote at that time by the House favoring such action. Out of the 56 persons cited, 17 have now been indicted for contempt of Congress by grand juries.

Yesterday I received a piece of very gratifying news. On Monday morning Steve Nelson was indicted by a grand jury, along with four others, Irving David Fox, Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz, David Bohm, and Marcel Scherer. I want to congratulate the members of the grand jury on this action. I also want to congratulate United States Attorney Fay for his expeditious handling of these indictments. I hope and urge that Attorney Fay and his staff will be just as prompt in prosecuting these cases as he was in bringing them before the grand jury.

I rejoice more over the news concerning Steve Nelson, because to me he appears probably the most dangerous organizer the Soviet Union has ever trained and placed in this country. Steve Nelson has roamed this land, comparatively unmolested, and preached his Godless gospel to workers in all types of factories and plants, labor union groups, groups of young and impressionable students as well as teachers in schools and universities. In general he has managed to insinuate himself into almost every segment of our population's economy, as well as thought. No one man has been given more free rein in spreading the vicious propaganda designed to enslave our people by Soviet Russia. Steve Nelson has used our country in many ways, and has been protected by wealthy and influential friends, even managing to influence certain Members of Congress. There is no doubt about it, he is a master organizer and a very willing tool of Joe Stalin. I rejoice that he has finally been brought to heel, and will be happy to see the day his power is destroyed, and he will no longer be able to influence any part of our American people in their thinking. His case brings to my mind a quotation often heard:

The mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small.

I would like to refer you to two reports published by the House Un-American Activities Committee, entitled "Hearings Regarding Steve Nelson, Including Foreword," dated June 8, 1949, and "Report on Atomic Espionage (Nelson-Weinberg-Hiskey-Adams Cases), dated September 29, 1949." A careful reading of just these two reports should convince any doubting Thomases among you that Steve Nelson and others of his ilk are no idle threat to America. For those who do not care to obtain these reports, I might refer you to the August 9 issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this past session, where I was able to have placed a fund of information on Steve Nelson and others.

Now, taking up the case of Dr. Joseph W. Weinberg, or Scientist X. This case is one of which I have personal knowledge. I was assigned during the war years to the Berkeley, Calif., territory as an FBI agent. Dr. Weinberg was attached to the teaching staff of the University of California in Berkeley, Calif., as a research physicist, working, by the way, on part of the formula connected with the atomic bomb, and his activities drew the attention of the FBI, along with a group of other research physicists. Scientist X was, of course, tied in with the activities of Steve Nelson, being used by him to get information for Russia concerning the work on the atomic bomb.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I ask unanimous consent to insert excerpts from a report of the Committee on Un-American Activities entitled "Report on Atomic Espionage—Nelson-Weinberg and Hiskey-Adams Cases."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The excerpts are as follows:

REPORT ON ATOMIC ESPIONAGE

(Nelson-Weinberg and Hiskey-Adams cases)

SCIENTIST X CASE

This case deals with the activities of that branch of the Communist espionage apparatus which operated on the Pacific coast, particularly within the radiation laboratory of the University of California at Berkeley which was engaged in certain activities in connection with the development of the atomic bomb. This case, in the past, has been identified by the committee as the Scientist X case. The committee, as a result of an investigation pursued this year, has received testimony identifying the scientist involved in this case as Joseph Woodrow Weinberg.

Previous reports regarding the Scientist X case have identified Steve Mesarosh, alias Louis Evans, alias Steve Nelson, as the Communist espionage agent who was engaged in securing information regarding the development of the atomic bomb from Scientist X.

Under the guidance of Steve Nelson, infiltration of the radiation laboratory actually began in other ways. A cell was developed within the laboratory consisting of five or six young physicists. The existence of the cell has been established in sworn testimony before this committee. According to a sworn statement by a witness, Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz was the principal Communist Party organizer. The records of this committee also reflect that David Bohm, presently a professor of physics at Princeton University, was also a member of this cell. Upon two occasions both Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz and David Bohm declined to answer questions regarding their respective memberships in this cell upon the ground that to do so might tend to incriminate them.

The details of the meeting between Nelson and Scientist X are set forth as follows:

Late one night in March 1943, a scientist at the University of California, who identified himself as "Joe" went to the home of Steve Nelson, after having made arrangements earlier in the evening with Steve Nelson's wife to meet Nelson at Nelson's home. When Joe arrived at Nelson's home, Nelson was not present but arrived at about 1:30 on the morning of the following day. Upon his arrival at his home, Nelson greeted Joe and the latter told him that he had some information that he thought Nelson could use. Joe then furnished highly confidential information regarding the experiments conducted at the radiation laboratories of the University of California at Berkeley. At the time this occurred, the radiation laboratories at Berkeley were engaged in vital work in the development of the atomic bomb.

Several days after Nelson had been contacted by Joe, Nelson contacted the Soviet consulate in San Francisco and arranged to meet Peter Ivanov, the Soviet vice consul, at some place where they could not be observed. Ivanov suggested that he and Nelson meet at the "usual place."

As a result of the surveillance that was being kept on Nelson, the meeting between Nelson and Ivanov was found to take place in the middle of an open park on the St. Francis Hospital grounds in San Francisco. At this meeting, Nelson transferred an envelope or package to Ivanov. A few days after this meeting between Nelson and Ivanov, on the St. Francis Hospital grounds, the third secretary of the Russian Embassy in Washington, a man by the name of Zubilin came to the Soviet consulate in San Francisco. Shortly after his arrival, Zubilin met Nelson in Nelson's home and at this meeting paid Nelson 10 bills of unknown denominations.

When Nelson testified before the committee in September 1948, he refused to answer all pertinent questions on the ground that his answers would tend to incriminate him. During this interrogation, he was asked whether he was acquainted with Vassili Zubilin, of the Soviet Embassy, and refused to answer on the ground that to do so might incriminate him.

EXTRACTS FROM INTELLIGENCE REPORTS—SCIENTIST X CASE

During the course of the committee's investigation of the Scientist X case, certain information contained in reports made by intelligence agents was obtained by the committee. An extract from one of these reports reads as follows:

"A very reliable and highly confidential informant advised that certain instructions had been given by Steve Nelson, who was at the time a member of the national committee of the Communist Party of the United States, to the scientist identified herein as Joseph W. Weinberg, a research physicist connected with the atomic bomb at the University of California, at Berkeley, Calif. The instructions were that Weinberg should furnish Nelson with information concerning the atomic bomb project so that Nelson could, in turn, deliver it to the proper officials of the Soviet Government. Nelson advised Weinberg to furnish him any information which he might obtain from trustworthy Communists working on the atomic project; he, Nelson, being of the belief that collectively the Communist scientists working on the project could assemble all the information regarding the manufacture of the atomic bomb. Nelson told Weinberg that all Communists engaged on the atomic-bomb project should destroy their Communist Party membership books, refrain from using liquor, and use every precaution regarding their espionage activities."

At the time of this meeting, according to an extract from an intelligence report, Weinberg furnished Nelson with information regarding the experiments which had been conducted in connection with the development of the atomic bomb at the radiation laboratories of the University of California. The information furnished Nelson by Weinberg was taken down in the form of notes by Nelson.

An extract from a report filed with the committee states that Weinberg, while employed on the atomic bomb project, had as his closest associates Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz, David Joseph Bohm, Max Bernard Friedman, and Irving David Fox, all of whom have refused to answer questions propounded by the committee regarding Communist Party activities and associations on the ground of self-incrimination.

Regarding the identity of the scientist as the person who furnished information concerning the atomic bomb to Steve Nelson in March of 1943, the following is an extract from testimony given to the committee during the month of August 1949 by James Sterling Murray, presently assistant to the president of the Lindsay Light & Chemical Co., West Chicago, Ill., and formerly officer in charge of security and intelligence in the San Francisco, Calif., area for the Manhattan Engineering District, which was the division of the United States Army charged with the development and production of the atomic bomb:

"Mr. MURRAY. A highly confidential informant informed our office that an unidentified scientist at the radiation laboratories had disclosed certain secret information about the Manhattan engineering project to a member of the Communist Party in San Francisco, and this confidential informant went on to say that such information was transmitted to the Russian consulate in San Francisco and later was on its way to Washington, D. C., and later out of the country in a diplomatic pouch. This was the only allegation we had to begin with, but through information which the confidential informant was able to supply us on the background of the particular scientist, we finally narrowed it down and definitely fixed the scientist as Weinberg."

In addition to the identification mentioned above, it should be pointed out that a number of persons who were engaged in the investigation of the Scientist X case have been interrogated by the committee, and/or its staff, and the identification made by Witness Murray has been concurred in by these other persons.

On Tuesday, April 26, 1949, Steve Nelson was again a witness before the Committee on Un-American Activities. On this occasion, Joseph W. Weinberg was brought face to face with Steve Nelson, and when Steve Nelson was asked the question as to whether he was acquainted with Weinberg, he refused to answer on the ground that to answer might tend to incriminate him.

Upon two occasions, Joseph W. Weinberg, in appearances before the committee, specifically denied having furnished any information regarding the atomic bomb to Steve Nelson. This is in direct contradiction to the testimony of James Sterling Murray and other witnesses who have appeared before the committee.

The committee, during its investigation, devoted a great deal of time toward establishing the true facts regarding a meeting which was held in the home of Joseph Weinberg in Berkeley, Calif., in August 1943. According to information furnished by witnesses before the committee, this meeting was attended by Bernadette Doyle, who was secretary to Steve Nelson during the period he was the Communist Party organizer for Alameda County, Calif.; Steve Nelson; Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz; Irving David Fox; David Bohm; and Ken Max Manfred, formerly known as Max Bernard Friedman. As will be shown, Joseph Weinberg was present in his apartment in Berkeley, Calif., at the time this meeting was held. All of the persons mentioned as attendants at this meeting were employed by the Radiation Laboratory of the University of California, at Berkeley, with the exception of Bernadette Doyle and Steve Nelson. All of these persons were reported, during the course of the committee's investigation, as being members of the Communist Party.

All of the persons mentioned as having attended the meeting in the home of Joseph Weinberg in August 1943 were subpenaed as witnesses before the committee, with the exception of Bernadette Doyle. Witnesses Lomanitz, Nelson, Fox, Bohm, and Manfred declined to answer questions regarding this meeting upon the ground that to do so might tend to incriminate them. Joseph W. Weinberg was questioned regarding this meeting upon two occasions by the committee, and denied that such a meeting had ever been held in his home, and further denied that he knew or had ever been acquainted with Steve Nelson and Bernadette Doyle.

Altogether Joseph Weinberg has appeared before the committee upon three occasions, and pertinent extracts of the testimony given by him upon these appearances before the committee are being set forth as follows:

"QUESTION. I show you a photograph of an individual and ask if you have ever seen this person.

"Mr. WEINBERG. No; I have not seen him before.

"QUESTION. Mr. Chairman, I have shown the witness a picture of an individual known as Steve Nelson.

"Have you ever known this person under any name other than Steve Nelson?

"Mr. WEINBERG. So far as I can recollect, no.

"QUESTION. Mr. Weinberg, are you certain you have never seen this individual whose picture I have shown you [showing photograph to Mr. Weinberg]?

"Mr. WEINBERG. Within reason, I am.

"QUESTION. I have shown the witness a picture and he said he is reasonably certain he has never seen Steve Nelson. I am sure the witness is aware of the penalties of perjury. I am sure his counsel has advised him of the penalties of perjury before a committee of Congress.

"You are now viewing two pictures of Steve Nelson. That is not Mr. Nelson's real name. He is known under various names, but I ask you if you have ever seen that individual, if you ever saw him in the years 1942, 1943, 1944, or 1945.

"Mr. WEINBERG. So far as I know now I have never seen him. I don't think it is necessary to call your attention to the fact that you ask me about events that happened 5 years ago and that I have a very large circle of very casual acquaintances. Within those reasonable limits I would say I have not seen him.

"QUESTION. You have never seen that individual?

"Mr. WEINBERG. So far as I am aware.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Now, I believe you met Steve Nelson in Washington on April 26, 1949. Did you meet him prior to that time or had you met him prior to that time?

"Mr. WEINBERG. No.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Now, let me ask you if on or about the 17th day of August 1943 Steve Nelson came to your home at the address which you have just given, in Berkeley, Calif.?

"Mr. WEINBERG. I remember no such occasion.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Do I understand that you merely do not recollect or that you deny that he came there to visit you and that you saw him there?

"Mr. WEINBERG. The situation was more or less this, and perhaps I should take a moment to explain. At this time I had a very wide circle of acquaintances there. There were many people who dropped into my house. There were many students who brought friends and introduced them and who promptly walked out of my life thereafter. I exempt such possibilities when I say I do not recollect the occasion. That is, I would not be prepared to state emphatically and with absolute certainty that no such person ever dropped into my house. I would certainly be prepared to state emphatically that I had nothing significant to do with him at the time.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Do you know Bernadette Doyle?

"Mr. WEINBERG. No; I do not.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Is it not a fact that on the 17th day of August 1943 Steve Nelson and Bernadette Doyle visited you at your house?

"Mr. WEINBERG. I certainly don't remember any such visit. Or at least I don't remember the occasion.

"Mr. TAVENNER. I did not get the last answer.

"Mr. WEINBERG. I have no specific memory of such a visit or that it mattered or that a person by the name of Doyle was ever introduced to me.

"Mr. NIXON. Mr. Chairman, the witness has qualified several answers of late that he does not remember a visit that 'mattered,' and I think the record should be clear that that is not responsive to the question. Whether the visit mattered or not is not the point. It is whether or not these people visited him.

"Mr. WEINBERG. Well, then, sir, to the best of my ability, I would answer the question with a qualification that I do not remember such a visit, in the interests of saying strictly what I am qualified to say.

"Mr. WALTER. In other words, the visit made no impression?

"Mr. HARRISON. Nothing happened that would have made any impression on your mind?

"Mr. WEINBERG. That's correct. That was the intent of my remark that it did not matter.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Was there another occasion in 1943 on which Bernadette Doyle met you at the front door of your house and at which time you had a short conversation with her?

"Mr. WEINBERG. I remember no such occasion.

"Mr. TAVENNER. You still state that you have never met Bernadette Doyle?

"Mr. WEINBERG. Not to my knowledge.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Do you know now where Bernadette Doyle lived?

"Mr. WEINBERG. No; I do not.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Have you ever been to her house?

"Mr. WEINBERG. No.

"Mr. TAVENNER. Did you ever attend any of the meetings of the Young Communist League?

"Mr. WEINBERG. No.

"Mr. NIXON. Would you remember if Mr. Nelson had come to your house and spent an hour or so alone with you?

"Mr. WEINBERG. I think if Nelson had come to my house and introduced himself as some sort of high-ranking Communist and spoke to me for any length of time I would remember that occasion.

"Mr. CASE. Was that where you met Steve Nelson?

"Mr. WEINBERG. I certainly don't remember meeting Steve Nelson at that meeting or any other meeting."

Upon one occasion when Joseph Weinberg appeared before the committee, he was brought face to face with Steve Nelson, and the following is an extract from the testimony relating to a confrontation between Nelson and Weinberg upon this occasion:

"Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Nelson, will you stand, please? Mr. Weinberg, will you face Mr. Nelson, the gentleman in back of you?

"Mr. Nelson, I ask you whether you are acquainted with this individual, Mr. Joseph Weinberg?

"Mr. NELSON. I refuse to answer that question on the ground that it may tend to incriminate me.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Weinberg, I ask you whether or not you are acquainted with Mr. Nelson, the gentleman facing you?

"Mr. WEINBERG. My only recollection of Mr. Nelson is a picture I have seen in the papers.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Are you acquainted with him?

Mr. WEINBERG. I am not acquainted with him.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Have you ever met Mr. Nelson?

"Mr. WEINBERG. I do not recall ever meeting Mr. Nelson. I do not believe I have ever met him."

With reference to the associations of Joseph W. Weinberg, Steve Nelson, and Bernadette Doyle, the following extracts from testimony presented to the committee by several witnesses on this point are being set forth herein. This testimony is in direct conflict with that of Joseph W. Weinberg.

"Mr. VELDE. You are satisfied that Dr. Joseph W. Weinberg was employed by the University of California in January 1943 and that he was engaged in work on the Manhattan project at that time?

"Mr. MURRAY. Yes. We were satisfied he was actively engaged in work on the project.

* * * * *

"Mr. MURRAY. On August 12, 1943, we were conducting physical surveillance of Joseph W. Weinberg, and at approximately 5 o'clock in the afternoon a highly confidential informant advised us that there was to be some type of a meeting at Weinberg's home that evening, at which Steve Nelson and Bernadette Doyle would be present. I immediately instituted surveillance of the entire area by the agents assigned to our office, to watch the visitors in the Weinberg home, and I myself stationed myself next door to the Weinberg home. I believe it was located on Blake Street in Berkeley, Calif.

"At approximately 9 o'clock I observed a man known to me to be Steve Nelson, and a woman known to me to be Bernadette Doyle, approach the Weinberg home and enter therein. After their entry into the Weinberg home, I, in the company of Agents Harold Zindle and George Rathman, went to the roof of the apartment house which was immediately next door to the Weinberg home, and from an observation post on the roof I was able to look into the second-story apartment of Weinberg.

"I noted Weinberg, Steve Nelson, and Bernadette Doyle, in company with at least five other members, some of whom were employed by the Radiation Laboratory, seated around a table in the dining room of the Weinberg apartment.

"At approximately 9:20 p. m. Weinberg came to the window and attempted to adjust the window, it being a very hot and sticky night. He had some difficulty in raising the window, or lowering it, or something, and Steve Nelson came over to help him, at which time I was able to get a good look and identify him.

"Mr. VELDE. Just a minute, if you please. Do you have a picture of Weinberg? I think at this point possibly you had better have him identify it.

"Mr. APPELL. We have a newspaper picture.

"Mr. RUSSELL. While Nelson and Weinberg were at the window, did you observe whether or not any conversation took place between the two individuals?

"Mr. MURRAY. I did observe some conversation, but I think it only had to do with the window adjustment at that point. I observed them sitting around the table, at which time the conversation appeared to be very serious.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Do you recall the other persons around the table in Weinberg's apartment at this meeting you are describing?

"Mr. MURRAY. I don't recall all. I know Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz, David Bohm, Irving David Fox, Max Friedman. I know Max Friedman was there, but for a very short time. He was the first one to leave.

"Mr. RUSSELL. What other agents of the Manhattan Engineering District accompanied you on the occasion of this surveillance?

"Mr. MURRAY. Special Agents Harold Zindle and George Rathman.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Will you spell Rathman, please?

"Mr. MURRAY. R-a-t-h-m-a-n.

"Mr. RUSSELL. These two agents were also assigned to the Manhattan Engineering District, were they not?

"Mr. MURRAY. Yes; they were. I was their immediate superior.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Did you maintain a surveillance of the Weinberg apartment?

"Mr. MURRAY. Yes; we did. I believe the meeting broke up at about 10:15 p. m., at which time we saw a general shaking of hands and a general showing of disposition to leave, at which time I ran down to the street floor again and observed Nelson and Doyle leaving together. They turned east on Blake Street, and I turned east on Blake Street also, and was immediately in front of them. We proceeded up the street approximately 100 feet in that fashion, at which time I thought, for the purposes of the record, that I should make some face-to-face contact with Mr. Nelson, and so I swung on my heel and started west on Blake Street, and in so doing I touched the shoulder of Nelson. We both immediately pardoned each other, and I continued west on Blake Street, and my surveillance of the entire proceeding was at an end at that point.

"Mr. APPELL. Mr. Murray, I show you a picture and ask you if you can identify the person on the left as you look at the picture as being that of Steve Nelson?

"Mr. MURRAY. Yes; that is Steve Nelson as slightly older than when I knew him.

"Mr. APPELL. And that is the individual you bumped into on Blake Street in Berkeley, Calif.?

"Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

"Mr. VELDE. Let that be marked "Murray Exhibit 1" and received in evidence.

"Mr. RUSSELL. When you bumped into him, that was after he had left the residence of Joseph Weinberg?

"Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

"Mr. APPELL. I show you a picture that appeared in the Washington Post as of September 22, 1948, and ask if that is the individual you observed in the Blake Street residence with Steve Nelson?

"Mr. MURRAY. Yes. I identify the picture as the picture of Dr. Joseph Weinberg, and as the individual who was in his own apartment sitting around the table with Mr. Nelson.

"Mr. APPELL. And the individual you saw standing at a window of the apartment together with Steve Nelson, attempting to fix the window?

"Mr. MURRAY. Yes; that is right."

This witness furnished additional information regarding the association of Steve Nelson and Joseph Weinberg which is not being set forth in this report.

The following is a signed statement obtained by committee investigators from George J. Rathman, whose name appears in the testimony of James Sterling Murray as one of the agents attached to the Manhattan Engineering District who accompanied him on the surveillance regarding the meeting held by Nelson and certain other persons in the apartment of Joseph Weinberg in Berkley, Calif.:

"I have been interviewed concerning a surveillance I conducted along with Harold Zindle and James Murray, who were attached with me to the Manhattan Engineering District as special agents, Counterintelligence Corps, in Berkeley, Calif.

"On or about August 17, 1943, at approximately 8:45 p. m., Harold Zindle, Murray, and myself arrived at an apartment house adjacent to the residence of the subject of this surveillance, Joseph W. Weinberg. During this surveillance I had occasion to observe the subject, Joseph Weinberg; a man identified to me as Steve Nelson; a woman identified to me as Bernadette Doyle; together with four or five additional persons whom I could not identify due to my point of observation, engaged in conversation. At approximately 9:45 p. m., Joseph Weinberg and the man known to me as Steve Nelson appeared at the window of the second-story apartment of Joseph Weinberg, closing the window and lowering the shade. At approximately 10 p. m. on the night of this surveillance Harold Zindle, Murray, and the undersigned left the roof of the apartment house and proceeded to the street where Murray and the undersigned saw Steve Nelson and Bernadette Doyle walking west on Blake Street from the direction of the subject's residence.

"I am certain if I could observe Steve Nelson personally today that I would be able to identify him as the person who was present in the second-story apartment of Joseph Weinberg on the night of the surveillance.

"I have read the above statement and to the best of my knowledge and belief this statement is true in every respect.

"G. J. RATHMAN."

The following is an extract from the testimony furnished the committee by William S. Wagener, who was also attached to the Manhattan Engineering District:

"Mr. WHEELER. Do you know an individual by the name of Bernadette Doyle?

"Mr. WAGENER. Yes, sir.

"Mr. WHEELER. Did she contact any scientists employed by the radiation laboratory?

"Mr. WAGENER. Joseph Weinberg.

"Mr. WHEELER. On how many occasions?

"Mr. WAGENER. Just once.

"Mr. WHEELER. Will you describe the meeting?

"Mr. WAGENER. One evening we were on physical surveillance, and we saw this woman whom we identified as Bernadette Doyle go up to the door of Joseph Weinberg and talk to him for a few minutes. She departed and got in her car. She had her car parked a block or so away. She got in her car and drove away.

"Shortly after, Weinberg and his wife came out, got in their car, and drove around very suspiciously, stopping here and there, and apparently like they were going to contact someone, but they apparently did not meet the individual, whoever it was."

The following is an extract from the testimony furnished by Col. John L. Lansdale, Jr., who was also attached to the Manhattan Engineering District during the time agents of that district were conducting an investigation of Joseph Weinberg. Other than the statement set forth herein, Colonel Lansdale was unable to provide the committee with further information because of the Executive order prohibiting him from furnishing information to a congressional committee:

"Mr. RUSSELL. Are you familiar with the name Steve Nelson?

"Colonel LANSDALE. Yes, sir.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Do you recall the names of any scientists who were contacted by Steve Nelson?

"Colonel LANSDALE. At least one; yes.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Who was that?

"Colonel LANSDALE. Joseph Weinberg."

It is to be noted that the testimony of James Sterling Murray regarding the association of Bernadette Doyle and Joseph Weinberg is corroborated by the signed statement of witness George J. Rathman and the testimony of William S. Wagener.

During the committee's examination of witnesses Mr. and Mrs. Paul Crouch, it was developed that both of these individuals had attended Communist Party meetings with Joseph Woodrow Weinberg. Mrs. Crouch recalled one particular meeting of the Young Communist League which Weinberg attended and which was held in a private home. Witness Paul Crouch, who was the predecessor of Steve Nelson as Communist Party organizer in Alameda County, Calif., identified Weinberg as a person who had attended the meeting of the Young Communist League, mentioned by his wife, and at least two or three other meetings of the Young Communist League which were held in a private home in Oakland, Calif. Neither of these witnesses, however, knew Weinberg's name. The testimony of Paul and Sylvia Crouch regarding their identification of Joseph Weinberg is being printed and made a part of this report.[1]

The committee has additional evidence regarding the meeting held in the home of Joseph W. Weinberg during the month of August 1943, but for obvious reasons all of the committee's evidence is not being incorporated in this report.

RECOMMENDATION FOR PERJURY PROSECUTION

Based upon the testimony set forth above and the testimony of other witnesses appearing before the committee, it is the committee's opinion that Joseph Weinberg made untruthful statements upon the three occasions he appeared before the committee.

Testimony before the committee and signed statements furnished to committee investigators indicate that Joseph Weinberg did not testify truthfully when he said:

1. That he did not know Steve Nelson.
2. That he did not know Bernadette Doyle.
3. That he had never attended any meeting of the Young Communist League, and that he had never been a member of the Communist Party.

It is recommended that the Attorney General convene a special grand jury in the District of Columbia for the purpose of hearing certain witnesses whose names will be furnished by this committee, and who have knowledge of the untruthful statements made by Joseph Weinberg.

WITNESSES INTERROGATED INCLUDED THOSE EMPLOYED ON ATOMIC BOMB PROJECT

The committee has interrogated the following persons who were attached to the radiation laboratory at the University of California at Berkeley and who, while employed there, were performing work on the atomic bomb:

Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz, formerly professor of physics at Fisk University, Nashville, Tenn.

David Bohm, who is presently assistant professor of physics at Princeton University, Princeton, N. J.

Ken Max Manfred, formerly known as Max Bernard Friedman, who is presently attending the University of California at Berkeley as a result of a scholarship granted him by the University of Puerto Rico amounting to $2,000 per year. Manfred is attending the University of California at Berkeley by virtue of a leave of absence granted him by the University of Puerto Rico, where he is employed as an assistant professor of physics, in order to obtain a degree of doctor of philosophy.

Irving David Fox, who is presently employed as a teaching assistant by the University of California at Berkeley.

Joseph Weinberg, who is presently employed as an assistant professor of physics at the University of Minnesota. Weinberg was born on January 19, 1917, at New York City, N. Y. He attended public schools in the Bronx, New York, and graduated from the DeWitt Clinton High School in New York City in 1932. During the years 1932 to 1936 he attended City College in New York City. In 1937 he attended the University of Michigan during the summer session, and during the academic year of 1938–39 he attended the University of Wisconsin. During the years 1939–43 he attended the University of California, from which he received a doctor of philosophy degree.

Frank Friedman Oppenheimer, whose resignation from the University of Minnesota as an assistant professor of physics was recently accepted by the university.

Robert R. Davis, who was formerly employed by the Manhattan engineering district at the University of California Radiation Laboratories.

Upon two occasions, witnesses David Bohm and Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz declined to answer questions regarding Communist Party membership and activities on the ground that to do so might tend to incriminate them. Witnesses Manfred and Fox declined to answer questions regarding Communist Party membership and associations on the occasion of their appearance before the committee on the ground that to do so might tend to incriminate them. Witness Robert R. Davis, on the occasion of his appearance before the committee, testified that he had been recruited into the Communist Party by Giovanni Rossi Lomanitz. Frank Friedman Oppenheimer, upon the occasion of his appearance before the committee, admitted former membership in the Communist Party but declined to answer any questions pertaining to the Communist associations of other individuals.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, the unanimous recommendation by the House Un-American Activities Committee members for the prosecution of Dr. Joseph W. Weinberg for perjury was made about 15 months ago. The Attorney General was furnished with names of witnesses who could substantiate the charge of perjury. I previously criticized the Department of Justice for failure to bring grand-jury action in this particular case. I realize full well that the Attorney General would like to win every criminal case he tries, and that in many ways is a laudable ambition. I realize further that the Department of Justice attorneys want to do all they can to preserve the rights and freedoms of individuals on trial and abhor conviction of an innocent man; however, in this particular case it seems that the desire on the part of the Attorney General's office to protect the innocent is not being furthered in good faith. There is also another class of people whose rights must be considered, they being the great majority of American citizens who are loyal to our form of government. In my opinion this class of citizens also deserve protection against those who are disloyal and those who would attempt to betray us to foreign nations. In any event, there is no reason why the evidence which has already been assembled, partly by the Attorney General's office and partly by the Un-American Activities Committee, should not be immediately presented to the grand jury. If the grand jury, in conjunction with the Attorney General's office handling the case, feels there is not sufficient evidence to warrant the indictment for perjury of Dr. Weinberg, they can always vote a no true bill but some action should be taken by the Attorney General immediately. After all, Dr. Weinberg is still teaching young men and women nuclear physics at the University of Minnesota. His innocense or guilt should be determined in accordance with the American system of jurisprudence and thus alleviate or substantiate any fear which might be in the minds of the officials of the University of Minnesota regarding the loyalty of one of its instructors.

At this point I would like to ask unanimous consent to insert exerpts from the House Un-American Activities Report entitled "Report on Atomic Espionage, Nelson-Weinberg and Hiskey-Adams Cases" in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This report deals directly with the case of Dr. Joseph W. Weinberg and should afford much food for thought.

In closing I would like to say this. We are allowing our sons to fight on foreign soil to protect another country from communism. We are pouring billions into European countries to protect them from the further inroads of communism, endeavoring to stem and turn back the tide which has already threatened to engulf the whole of Europe. In the meantime, communism has been allowed to flourish freely in our own country, or at least has not been checked to any appreciable extent. The American public has shown that it is aroused over this problem, and it is time we kept faith with them. Do you think our young men are going to faithfully fight and die to rid a foreign country of communism, only to come home and then with equanimity or indifference face the ugly picture of communism in their own country? Mr. Speaker, it should make us pause and think.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article entitled "A Tax Program To Support the Policy of Containment."

Mr. GWINN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, and in one to include an editorial from the New York Times.

Mrs. HARDEN asked and was given permission to extend her remarks and include an editorial appearing in the November 29 edition of the Daily Clintonian, edited and published by George Carey, of Clinton, Ind.

Mr. DOYLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include appropriate material.

Mr. COUDERT (at the request of Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin) was given permission to extend his remarks and include an address.

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MARSALIS, indefinitely, on account of death in family.

To Mr. KEARNS (at the request of Mr. CORBETT), on account of death in family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, December 6, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1768. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting proposed supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1951 in the amount of $934,000 for the Alaska Communication System (H. Doc. No. 730); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

1769. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting proposed supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1951 in the amount of $5,068,000 for the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics (H. Doc. No. 731); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS: Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Preliminary report (pt. II) pursuant to House Resolution 114, Eighty-first Congress; without amendment (Rept. No. 2457, pt. II). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Preliminary report (pt. III) pursuant to House Resolution 114, Eighty-first Congress; without amendment (Rept. No. 2457, pt. III). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. SPENCE: Committee on Banking and Currency. H. R. 9763. A bill to amend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended; without amendment (Rept. No. 3143). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee: Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. S. 4102. An act relating to contracts for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other mechanical devices; without amendment (Rept. No. 3144). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee: Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. S. 3263. An act to amend Veterans' Preference Act of 1944 with respect to certain mothers of veterans; without amendment (Rept. No. 3145). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee: Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. S. 3654. An act to amend section 3 of the Postal Salary Act of July 6, 1945; without amendment (Rept. No. 3146). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee: Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. S. 3672. An act to amend section 3 (c) of the Civil Service Retirement Act so as to make the exclusion from such act of temporary employees of the Senate and House of Representatives inapplicable to such employees with one or more years of service; without amendment (Rept. No. 3147). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee: Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. S. 3910. An act relating to the assignment of surplus clerks in the postal transportation service; without amendment (Rept. No. 3148). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. SABATH: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 874. Resolution for consideration of H. R. 9780, a bill providing the privilege of becoming a naturalized citizen of the United States to all aliens having a legal right to permanent residence; without amendment (Rept. No. 3149). Referred to the House Calendar.

By Mr. WALSH:

H. R. 9863. A bill for the relief of Man Foon Tow; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, hope of the souls that seek Thee, strength of the souls that find Thee, pushed and pressed by grave questions and vexing problems we would bow, first of all, at this daily altar dedicated to the far look. Before our eyes may there tower those lofty and eternal verities that outlast the strident noises of any day.

The world about us is full of wild commotion, the clamor of the violent, the dark deeds of the ruthless and the agony of uncounted hosts of Thy children, haunted by nameless dread and ground in the dust of tyranny. We cannot adequately face such a world and make our humble contribution to the healing of its tangled, tragic state unless our faith in Thy power to make even the wrath of man praise Thee and in the ultimate victory of Thy purpose is kept untarnished.

"Lord, in this hour of tumult,
Lord, in this night of fears;
Keep open, O keep open,
Our eyes, our hearts, our ears."

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MAGNUSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, December 5, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess profits tax, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. NEELY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 209) to amend and extend the provisions of the District of Columbia Emergency Rent Act, as amended, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 2587) thereon.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES—EXECUTIVE BRANCH PERSONNEL

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it has been the practice of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures of some years standing to submit monthly personnel reports as certified officially by the several executive departments and agencies of the Federal Government. The last such report submitted before the recess was for the month of July.

As chairman of the committee I submit a table consolidating the reports for August and September which were compiled during the recess, and also the regular report for the month of October, which is compiled as of today. In accordance with standing practice I request that these consolidated tables, a statement prepared by me, and the regular report be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables, statement, and report were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Civilian employment in the executive branch of the Federal Government continued moving upward in October for the fourth consecutive month. The net increase during the month was 33,563, averaging more than 1,000 a day. The October total was 2,130,384, as compared with 2,096,821 in September.

There was an increase in the civilian employment by the National Military Establishment of 37,207. This was offset to some degree by a decrease of 3,644 in the civilian agencies.

Of the 37,207 increase in the Military Establishment, 22,364 were employed for industrial-type work, and 1,991 of these were assigned to duty stations outside continental United States. Total civilian employment for the National Military Establishment in October was 941,202 as compared with 903,995 in September.

In addition to the civilian increase in the Military Establishment, the Veterans' Administration also reported a substantial increase of 1,485.

Among the agencies reporting decreases were Agriculture with reductions totaling 3,243, Interior Department with reductions of 1,221, Post Office Department with reductions of 1,673, and the Commerce Department with reductions of 600. The reductions in Agriculture and Commerce Departments were attributed largely to a decline in seasonal requirements, and the reductions in the Commerce Department were attributed to further separations among temporary employees for the Seventeenth Decennial Census.

Employment by the civilian agencies exclusive of the National Military Establishment in October totaled 1,189,182, as compared with 1,192,826 in September.

During September, the last month in the first quarter of fiscal year 1951, the civilian payroll was running at the rate of $7,000,000,000 a year as compared with the original estimate in January of $6,700,000,000.

These figures were developed today from official signed personnel reports submitted by the executive departments and agencies to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures for the month of October.

FEDERAL PERSONNEL IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH, SEPTEMBER–OCTOBER 1950, AND PAY, AUGUST–SEPTEMBER 1950

Note with reference to personal service expenditure figures: It should be noted that the latest expenditure figures for personal service shown in table I of this report are for the month of September, and that they are compared with personal service expenditure figures for the month of August, whereas the latest employment figures covered in this report are for the month of October and are compared with the month of September. This lag in personal service expenditure figures is necessary in order that actual expenditures may be reported.

(Figures in the following report are compiled from signed official personnel reports by the various agencies and departments of the Federal Government. Table I shows total personnel employed inside and outside continental United States, and pay, by agency. Table II shows personnel employed inside continental United States. Table III shows personnel employed outside continental United States. Table IV gives by agency the industrial workers employed by the Federal Government. For purposes of comparison, figures for the previous month are shown in adjoining columns.)

S. 4223. A bill to amend the Defense Production Act of 1950; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. TAYLOR:

S. 4224. A bill for the relief of Jose Maria Sangroniz-Equiluz; and

S. 4225. A bill for the relief of Ignacio Aguirrechu y Zuazo; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KNOWLAND:

S. 4226. A bill for the relief of certain Yugoslavs; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 4227. A bill to authorize payments on automobiles purchased by certain amputee veterans of the Korean operations equal to those authorized for veterans of World War II, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

S. 4228. A bill for the relief of Col. Arthur L. Shreve; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL—AMENDMENTS

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I submit amendments intended to be proposed by me to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendments may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the amendments were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. FLANDERS to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, viz: At the end of the joint resolution insert the following new section:

"SEC. 2. (a) Paragraph (1) of section 204 (b) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, is amended by striking out 'paragraphs (2) and (3)' and inserting in lieu thereof 'paragraphs (2), (3), and (6).'

"(b) Section 204 (b) of such act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"'(6) Notwithstanding any other provision of this act, the Housing Expediter shall promptly make a general adjustment in the maximum rents for all controlled housing accommodations so as to provide for fixing such maximum rents at the rate prevailing for comparable housing accommodations not under control, and he shall from time to time make adjustments for such relevant factors as he shall determine and deem to be of general applicability in respect of such accommodations, including increases or decreases in property taxes and other costs within the defense rental area.'"

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and to provide a more appropriate base for rental rates under such act."

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ON DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950

Mr. MAYBANK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 370), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of the hearings conducted before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on S. 3936, Eighty-first Congress, on the Defense Production Act of 1950. Such additional copies shall be for the use of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency.

THE WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON CHILDREN AND YOUTH

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, several thousand citizens are meeting this week in Washington in the Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth. They are people from every State in the Union, from farms, small towns, and cities. They are people of all faiths and nationalities, people representing hundreds of national civic and professional organizations. Some represent local and State White House committees and conferences which have been looking into what their communities and States are doing for children and what more needs to be done.

This is a conference of people—including young people as well as adults—who are pooling their experience, the facts they have found, their ideas and their hopes of what can be done in the years ahead to help children develop their own capacities to the utmost to handle the responsibilities and problems that are before them.

Because it is a representative group, the findings of this conference will influence in great measure, and for years to come, all manner of programs and activities that are undertaken in behalf of children.

I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD in connection with this statement three newspaper columns written by myself and distributed by United Feature Syndicate.

There being no objection, the columns were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON AND YOU

(By United States Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH)

OUR CHILDREN—AMERICA'S FUTURE—I

WASHINGTON.—Beginning next Sunday, December 3, the Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth will be in session here. The meetings will last 5 days and while I will be in Tucson, Ariz., for a lecture engagement on Sunday I hope to attend some of the sessions later in the week.

Considered at the conference will be (1) the technical report dealing with the facts established by the sciences that contribute to our knowledge of child growth and development; (2) information about programs and practices affecting children and young people in such fields as education, health, welfare, religion, recreation, play, and leisure-time activities; and (3) reports of the problems, accomplishments, and conditions relating to our children.

This meeting will not be just a debating-society event. Definite action will come from it. Findings and recommendations will be made by more than threescore agencies of the Federal Government, several hundred national voluntary organizations serving children and young people and thousands of private citizens.

The goal of the conference is simple and clear, but yet far-reaching. The aim is to give to every child a fair chance for a healthy personality. There is nothing new in this objective, but there is in the approach toward achieving the goal.

While past efforts have been more on the individual scale in the private home and in local and State groups, the approach now will be on a coordinated, organized national basis.

The awful truth is that thousands of our children just don't get the care and affection in their homes that make for their growing into valuable adult citizens. Many more thousands are homeless. In the great majority of case histories of criminals there is always found a background of an unhappy home life. The care and affection that might have molded him into a valuable, law-abiding citizen was missing.

Vague generalities will not dominate the conference. Instead it will seek specifically at least partial answers to (1) how can children be helped to develop the mental, emotional, and spiritual qualities essential for individual happiness and responsible citizenship and (2) what physical, economic, and social conditions are necessary for this development.

The conference will be divided into five sections. Section I will deal with furthering healthy personality development in children and youth; section II with furthering healthy personality development through the family, the church, the school and other social institutions; section III with making more positive the influence of religious, social and economic forces on personality development; section IV with furthering the healthy personality development of children in special situations, such as children in families with inadequate incomes, with part-time parents, on the move, with severe physical and mental limitations, with severe emotional disorders, and who rebel; and section V with mobilizing citizens for the improvement of conditions affecting the personality development of children and youth.

I will continue this discussion tomorrow with observations as to the need for this conference and organized effort outside of the family home.

WASHINGTON AND YOU

(By United States Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH)

OUR CHILDREN—AMERICA'S FUTURE—II

WASHINGTON.—To most of you who are fond parents whose interest in life is centered in your children and in giving them the very best that you can, the Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth may not seem necessary or of vital importance. Perhaps you may feel that children are a private family concern of parents and something for which the Government has no responsibility and should have no voice. Yet, it is to you conscientious parents that the conference to be held here next week should mean the most.

The fantastic discovery and development of physical sciences during the first half of the twentieth century certainly underscore the fact that in this atomic age none of us knows what the next 50 years will bring. But our children and their children and grandchildren will know.

Key to the future now is tied to the use that is made of physical energy, of atomic power and of the many other amazing discoveries of the past 50 years. What the use is will be in the hands of our children. Their decision will in turn depend upon the manner and degree to which we equip and prepare them to handle the power and the problems we will to them.

This should make it crystal clear to all of us that we must make it possible for our children to develop, to the utmost, their individual capacities for creative living. Their talents must be directed toward ways to give positive meaning and high purpose to life. Consequently, it is imperative that we carefully appraise just how much our society is doing on this score, how much it isn't doing, and how much and what it should do to secure for every child a fair chance for a healthy personality.

The rapidly growing population of our country and the many mutual interests and concern that we share have accelerated our appreciation and use of cooperative planning and action. One form of such cooperative effort is the White House Conference, which has been held every 10 years since 1900. Gratifying achievements have been realized in meeting the physical and material needs of children. But this progress has not been matched on the spiritual, mental, and emotional needs of children because the past emphasis has not been so much on this side. It will be in the future, however, in the recognition that mental juvenile health is as important as physical juvenile health.

There is a great gap between what we do and what we know. That gap has made growing up a hazardous experience for many children today. If there be any doubt of this, one need only check the court records on dependent, neglected, and delinquent children; or on the hundreds of millions of dollars spent each year on hospitals for the mentally ill, on social workers, on experts studying divorce, desertion, and crime.

Less susceptible for measurement is the human erosion that stems from neglected children who grow up to be maladjusted adults—suspicious, frightened, angry people who spend their life in misery and make life unpleasant for relatives and friends. Nor is there any accounting for the inately talented humans whose gifts are never developed because of juvenile neglect. These persons might have contributed immeasurably toward scholarship, statesmanship, creative expression, and citizenship.

How the child is molded today greatly controls the shape of the adult tomorrow. Yet in the speed of the breathtaking events of the present—at the very time when impressionable adolescence can be irreparably warped by lack of balanced perception based on maturity of experience and judgment—there is a dangerous trend to assume that children are automatically smarter today because of the radio, the television, etc., than yesterday's children. It is against this danger and for the maximum application of mature guidance, that the Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth is aimed.

Tomorrow I shall conclude this series by trying to point up some of the complicated aspects of this problem.

WASHINGTON AND YOU

(By United States Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH)

OUR CHILDREN—AMERICA'S FUTURE—III

WASHINGTON.—The primary objective of the Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth next week is to provide every child with at least a fair chance to develop a healthy personality. "Personality" in this case doesn't mean just charm. It means the aggregate of the child now and as an adult later—what he is, has been, and aspires to be.

Heredity and environment are commonly accepted as the two determinants of what each of us is like. Each of us takes from his environment that which he needs for spiritual gratification, physical fulfillment, mental, emotional, and social realization. This is a part of the growing process—of the transition from childhood through adolescence to manhood.

And from that accumulated experience of the growing process it is inescapable that the quality of any individual personality is in direct ratio to the quality of the life experience. Therefore, if any of our children become deficient adults, it must be attributable to the lack of providing conditions necessary for proper growth and realization of basic aspirations.

To blind ourselves to this and to our responsibility is to surrender to a continuing wastage of human resources. Unchecked, that can lead only to national moral, mental, and physical bankruptcy. Our greatest asset is human resources—and our greatest human resources are our children. How are they doing in our country? We must find out and we must act upon those findings.

Last year one-third of our total population was children and young people. Generally speaking, they were doing well physically and their physical health had been well cared for.

But the records of juvenile delinquency marred the mental health side of the picture. It has become increasingly clear that this is largely the result of lack of emotional security for our children.

In combating this problem in the past we have made the mistake of using hit-and-miss theories instead of a thorough analytical approach. We have tried to apply contradictory cures before diagnosing the ills, symptoms, and causes. We have put the cart before the horse.

If you need any proof that our cures are contradictory, let me list a few of broad and popular vintage. Some people say that newborn babies should be fed by the clock. Others maintain that babies should themselves set their own feeding times and let you know by crying when they are hungry. And when a baby cries, some people say let him cry it out. Others, in horror, say that the crying baby should be picked up and rocked back to sleep or contentment.

Some people say children should be mentally disciplined without the use of physical force. Others say, "Spare the rod and spoil the child." There are those who advocate that children be given freedom to use free hours as they will. Others say this only leads to children getting into trouble and that they still look to us for guidance.

There are conflicting "rule of thumb" theories on personality development. Some people express the belief that a child's personality is set by the time he is 5 or some other exact age and that it doesn't matter what is done by parents and adults after that time, while others contend that people change and grow at every age.

It's high time that we found out which theories are right and which are wrong. It's high time that we found facts instead of theorizing only on the basis of personal, unsubstantiated beliefs. If we, as adults, are not in agreement and are confused, what then is the case with the children themselves?

It is in this realization that next week's White House conference is striking out to determine the facts and find the answers as much as is humanly possible. All-inclusive, quick cures are not anticipated, because findings must come before cures. But it is this very spirit which augurs so well for the work of this group and which merits the full support of you and me.

SUGGESTIONS FOR COMBATING AND DEFEATING AGGRESSION

Mr. MAGNUSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CAIN. I appreciate the indulgence of my colleague the senior Senator from Washington.

Mr. President, only in order to minimize questions, I ought to say that for about a year I have been in need of surgical attention to correct a wartime ailment. In an effort to prepare myself physically for the Eighty-second Congress the necessary work will be undertaken on the date I am permitted to be absent by leave of the Senate.

Mr. President, the United Nations are busy, the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain are busy, and most of us as Senators are busy at everybody's task of anticipating the needs and requirements of tomorrow.

Unfortunately, though the fact may be unavoidable at this time, we in the Senate of the United States and America generally, are not informed as to what the United Nations or the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain have in mind for tomorrow. It is likely that no firm decisions have been reached. All of us hope that a course of positive and understandable action will soon be agreed upon and presented in its every last detail to the American people.

In an effort to be helpful to those in higher executive and policy-making authority who must be as troubled and anxious these days as I am, I offer my own estimate of the situation which presently perplexes mankind.

If we, the United States, are to continue to work in and with the United Nations in its and our oft-repeated determination to stop and defeat aggression wherever and whenever it breaks out, every member nation, and this means fifty-odd nations, must immediately design a balance sheet which will accurately reflect the contribution in manpower, resources, and the armed forces it can or will make to the common effort and when these contributions can be drawn against; an effective mobile and hard-striking international police force must be promptly developed as a weapon to enforce policies and decisions of the United Nations; an American supreme commander must be appointed for the Atlantic Pact countries without delay, and each member nation within that pact must determine and then state publicly the number of ground force divisions, air and naval strength it can or will contribute to the defense of the North Atlantic community; Turkey and Greece must become full and equal members of the Atlantic Pact; every possibility for having Sweden become a member of the Atlantic Pact must be explored; a military, political, and economic understanding ought promptly be worked out with Spain, and Spain ought to become a full and equal member of the Atlantic Pact; Germany must be made a free and self-governed nation and given its complete right to rearm as it thinks best; Japan must be reconstituted as a nation and given the right and opportunity to rearm.

Unless these impelling requirements, most of which have been outstanding for years, are met and satisfied soon, any global contest against the forces of aggression, which is what we appear to be headed toward, will be no contest at all, and the free world if considered as a whole, and freedom, too, will disappear from the face of the earth for decades.

If an agreement is not reached to take prompt and positive action on these requirements, the United States, in my considered opinion, can only survive as a nation by living within its own confines and by using its own resources and strength to defend itself.

There can be no middle ground in the future. The United Nations and the free world must work, fight, and contribute jointly and equitably to either war or peace, or each nation must go its own way and do what it can to save itself.

The hour for decision is tragically late. The United Nations and the North Atlantic Community had better come to grips with the requirements in question and do so right now. Whether time remains to take the imperatively required steps must remain in serious doubt until the free world has agreed upon an operational plan and until this plan becomes effective.

America does not know at this moment where it really stands, or with whom it stands or from whom it can expect anything but words. America had better find out now where America stands—if America wants to live tomorrow.

How many of these stated considerations are under pointed and pressing consideration by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and by the United Nations, I do not know. How happy I should be as an American were I soon to be advised that action was being taken on all or most of them.

It is too easy to oversimplify a complicated and delicate situation. Perhaps I am guilty of doing this. My intention, however, has been to offer one man's evaluation of the day in which we live. As a Member of the Senate, I think it is for those who are closer to the questions to prove me wrong if my assumptions are not supported by fact. I have spoken as one American who wants to be of some constructive assistance to those in higher authority. I have spoken as one American who represents the views of other Americans. As Americans we want to know what those in higher authority expect of us. Until we are told by those in higher authority what is to be demanded from America and the free world I shall offer my own view for whatever it may be worth whenever I hold this action to be proper and constructive.

SHIPMENTS OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS FROM UNITED STATES PORTS TO COMMUNIST CHINA

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, in the last few days, upon learning that shipments of strategic materials were en route from United States ports to Communist China, I felt it a duty to make demand that these cargoes be denied to the enemy now engaged in deadly combat with our troops.

Two days ago, after receiving a cablegram from members of the crew of a United States ship in Hong Kong, I called the attention of the United States Senate to the startling facts in that case. As a result the cargo was unloaded in Hong Kong and will not be delivered to the Communists, as intended.

Over the week end, having learned that another ship had cleared from New York and was bound for North China with a sizable shipment of steel sheets, a highly strategic material, I urged the Office of International Trade to take any steps necessary to prevent the shipment reaching the proposed destination. Today this cargo is being unloaded in San Francisco. Thus, in these instances, it has been possible to thwart the efforts of our Communist foes to secure this very important matériel.

However, this by no means includes all the shipments of items of possible military or industrial use which are now being transported to Communist China.

In recent weeks, eight ships carrying the United States flag have left the port of New York bound for North China or Hong Kong carrying such material. Today these ships are on the high seas and, unless preventive action is taken, the cargoes will undoubtedly be delivered into the hands of the Nation's enemies.

One ship left New York November 2 carrying 125 drums of petrolatum, 17,000 pounds of penicillin, and 7,000 pounds of strategic materials.

A second ship sailed from New York November 13 carrying 865,000 pounds of second-grade tinplate.

A third, which sailed from New York November 15 carrying 267,000 pounds of tin, over 28,000 pounds streptomycin, over 18,000 pounds sulpha drugs.

A fourth, which left New York November 16 carrying over 3,000,000 pounds second-grade tin and other tin-mill products.

A fifth, which sailed from New York November 24 carrying 549,000 pounds tinplate, and so forth.

A sixth, which sailed from New York November 24 carrying thousands of pounds of auto parts.

Another ship, which left New York November 27 carrying 650,000 pounds of second-grade tinplate and tinplate materials.

An eighth ship, which left New York November 27 carrying 26,000 pounds of second-grade tinplate.

The names and present locations of the ships are readily available to our Federal officials.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONOR. I shall be pleased to yield when I have concluded my statement. I hope the Senator will bear with me so the continuity of the statement may be preserved.

Mr. THYE. I am glad to delay my question.

Mr. O'CONOR. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Minnesota when I have concluded.

On Sunday last, as was announced, all of these materials which are now en route to North China finally were placed under strict export control. In other words, none of this material could leave any American port today without proper export license, and I am sure that no such license would be granted to permit these strategic materials to get into the hands of Communist China. Note that the materials listed here are cargoes which have left only from the one port of New York. It is fair to assume that other cargoes of strategic materials from other ports are now on the high seas in other United States ships bound for Communist China.

It is indeed shocking to learn that these amounts of materials are being carried to the very people who at this moment are slaughtering American fighting men in North Korea. When we began this investigation a number of weeks ago, after the able senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], really initiated the move, it was surprising to discover so many obvious loopholes in the Nation's export-control program as it affected Communist-dominated areas. Everything possible was done to cause these loopholes to be plugged. As I said before, the Office of International Trade now has taken steps to tighten these export controls; but it is impossible to understand why this action was not taken months ago.

However, nothing is now being done, nor as far as we know, is anything now being planned, to stop the strategic materials which are now afloat in American bottoms bound for Communist North China. It is for that reason that we think it a public duty to demand that prompt and effective action be taken to prevent that material from falling into Communist hands.

This information concerning the shipments now on the high seas has just come to us, and there has not been opportunity to discuss the matter with officials in the executive departments. However, it is imperative that the Executive branch take every step possible to prevent delivery of these shipments. The Department of Commerce should explore every means; and, if necessary, it is hoped the President will consider invoking his authority to deny these supplies to the enemy. If no authority can be found, then the Executive branch should ask Congress at once to give them the right to remove these cargoes. If some action is not taken, it is my firm conviction that these ships will be placing into the hands of our enemies materials which will assist them in warring against us.

Mr. President, in these efforts to prevent valuable materials from being delivered to Communist areas from United States ports—and I note again that they are being carried in ships flying the American flag—I regret to say that we have achieved results only after the matter was brought forcibly to public attention. With this in mind, I have placed the entire situation before the Senate, so that our membership and the public at large may know what is transpiring.

Arguments have been made by those who would continue to trade with North China; but with American men fighting and dying and facing annihilation at the hands of the Communist Chinese forces, it would seem to be high time to stop "business as usual." According to published statements from official sources, we have continued much of our free trade with North China because the United States obtained from that country more in the form of valuable imports than we are sending them in these strategic exports. Our investigation has convinced me that for several months past we have not been receiving much of strategic value from North China that we could not obtain in other places. Included in the imports received from North China mainly are normal civilian items, such as hog bristles, hides, feathers, textiles, tea, dried eggs, and other foodstuffs.

Based on the available facts, it would seem to be sheer stupidity to continue to allow American goods to get into North China, or to permit American ships to carry any goods into that area. I am reliably informed—and we sought the advice of some of the very highest authorities in Government departments—that we could cut off all China trade this minute without impairing our defense program in any way.

Of course, if we cut off all civilian trade, it will result in some hardships to American businessmen engaged in the China trade. But it is also clear that for every dollar we give to North China for nonessential imports, we make a dollar available to them for the purchase of war materials from other nations in the world who may still insist on doing business as usual.

I, therefore, propose that our trade with North China be stopped instantly and that a complete embargo be placed on all shipments to those ports.

Objection may be raised to a complete cessation of trade with Communist China, on the basis that our shipping and business interests will sustain losses. However, when we think of the thousands of gallant young marines fighting in their bare feet in the snow; when we realize the agonies of cold and disaster suffered by our Army forces in retreat before the overwhelming masses of their enemies; when we recall the round-the-clock dangers to which our Air Force pilots have subjected themselves in an effort to cover the hard-pressed forces, there can be no possibility of question as to the choice to be made.

Mr. President, one American life is worth more than all the hog bristles that could be imported from China. The safety of our American fighting men far outweighs any financial gains that might have to be forgone because of the imposition of a strict embargo.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Maryland for the outstanding work he has done in connection with this matter. I had to leave the Capital for the recent campaign; and I left with the Senator from Maryland this very important inquiry, in which he has done such an able job by clearing up the matter during our absence. I wish to commend him for the work he has done. I think he has rendered a great service not only to the American people as a whole, but, in particular, to the Senate, especially in view of the condition in which we now find ourselves. At this time I wish to commend him publicly for what he has done.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I should like to repeat what I said before, namely, that it was the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] who really initiated this matter and brought to the attention of the Senate the first report of questionable shipments, without which I do not think the investigation would have begun then. So the Senator from Washington is to be thanked in the premises.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I should like to ask a question of the very able Senator from Maryland: Who are the exporters who hold licenses and now are shipping or exporting the strategic materials to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. O'CONOR. I shall be very glad to supply the Senator with any names or detailed information, all of which we have. I may say that in public hearings we summoned to Washington a number of exporters whose names we found on the export declarations or on the ships' manifests, and from them we gathered information as to the various circumstances under which the shipments were made.

Mr. THYE. Are many of those exporters old, reliable firms which have been recognized in the export field for years past; or are there some new firms, persons who have obtained licenses in recent months or years, who now are in that export business?

Mr. O'CONOR. Most of them are export firms which have been engaged in the business for quite an appreciable length of time. Some of them have entered this particular field in relatively recent times. In other words, apparently they were requested very urgently by persons in North China to bring about purchases. I have in mind particularly 4,500,000 pounds of pure copper which came from Japan all the way to New York, and then was transshipped around the world, back to North China. That was handled by a firm which had not theretofore been engaged in the export trade.

Mr. THYE. The Commerce Department has a committee which passes upon applications for export licenses, does it not?

Mr. O'CONOR. Yes.

Mr. THYE. That committee within the Commerce Department should in the first instance, ascertain the background of those who apply for such licenses, and why they make application for export licenses, and in that way safeguard against the making of just such shipments as the copper shipment which has been mentioned by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. President, I wish to say that the policy of importing dried, powdered eggs into the United States, when we have huge surpluses of powdered eggs on hand, seems to be the very height of folly.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield, so that I may ask a question of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. I have watched with great interest the development of these facts by the Senator from Maryland, and I wish to commend him most highly. At the same time, I am amazed that we have to argue about a subject of this sort.

Let me ask the Senator from Maryland why we could not impound the cargoes which are in the ships at sea, by informing the exporters that their licenses will be revoked if they do not withhold those goods from China.

Mr. O'CONOR. Possibly the entire fault does not lie with the shippers. These cargoes undoubtedly left American ports when the particular items in question were not on the so-called positive list; that is to say, the Office of International Trade had not then banned the shipment of those goods. We think that should have been done long ago. In certain instances we asked them to place on the positive list the shipment of certain materials.

So particular shipments such as those to which I have referred might have been made legally, in the sense that those materials and supplies were not on the positive list, and therefore did not need a license to be shipped.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield further to me, to permit me to ask another question of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. O'CONOR. I am glad to reply to questions.

Mr. STENNIS. Even though the materials were entirely legally shipped, when they left the United States ports, in view of the fact that the ships fly the American flag, could not the Commerce Department order those ships stopped at any place they might wish to do so?

Mr. O'CONOR. I think the Office of International Trade in the Department of Commerce, could modify the present regulations and could prevent the delivery and discharge of those cargoes to the consignees.

Mr. STENNIS. If the Senator does not receive assurances that such action will be taken or that such results will be brought about, will not the Senator introduce in the Senate proposed legislation of an emergency nature to cover this matter?

Mr. O'CONOR. I shall be very pleased to do so. As a matter of fact, I am determined to do so if the executive branch does not act.

That is why I suggested, in the statement I have made today, that the Department of Commerce might take effective action promptly. Over the week end the Department of Commerce took action which henceforth will require the issuance of licenses for cerain shipments. I think they can take immediate action in respect to these cargoes. However, if they do not, I think other action should be taken.

Mr. STENNIS. In my opinion the Senator will certainly have the wholehearted support of the entire Congress in respect to obtaining immediate results in connection with this matter, which is entirely of an emergency nature.

Again I wish to commend the Senator for his very fine presentation.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to join with the other Senators in commending the outstanding job which has been done by the junior Senator from Maryland in this regard, and I am particularly pleased to hear him recommend today that strong action be taken forthwith to embargo these shipments to Red China. I think one of the great weaknesses in the program to date is—and I wonder whether the Senator will not agree with me—that, first, there was a difference between the so-called prohibited list of the United States and that of the British Government, with respect to items which they were allowing to go to Hong Kong, for instance; and second, we must recognize the fact that in dealing with an aggressor power, as we are doing in Red China today, anything that helps their economy strengthens them in their hold upon their own population and their ability to make war against us. Therefore, this trade cannot be limited to a few selected items, but an entire embargo should be placed against them, so as to help disrupt the internal economy of Communist China, and thus in turn give aid to the non-Communist forces within China and the guerrilla movement, so that they can take effective action which will prevent or relieve the pressure against our forces now in Korea. Does the Senator not agree with that?

Mr. O'CONOR. I agree entirely with the statement made by the Senator from California, and, to give an illustration of what has happened, let me say that some time ago when we sought the action and brought to the attention of Federal officials the facts with respect to very large shipments, the quantities having aroused our suspicions, it was argued by them that the articles shipped were used for civilian purposes. We now find that much of the material has gone into the making of uniforms; and, as the Senator from California indicates, commodities which of course could be used for entirely civilian purposes, nevertheless have been employed to strengthen the industrial and the military potential of Communist China.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield further to enable me to ask a question of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Does the Senator from Maryland not agree also that for some of the commodities which are sent from Communist China to this country, the Chinese Communists are permitted to get dollar exchange, which in turn they use in the markets of Hong Kong to buy more strategic materials, which we ourselves would not permit to be shipped? So, again, not only is the economy of Communist China strengthened but its warmaking potential is also strengthened, and its efforts to drive American forces out of Korea are aided.

Mr. O'CONOR. That is unquestionably the case.

Mr. MORSE and Mr. LEHMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield; if so, to whom?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I desire further to yield to the Senator from Maryland, if there are further questions. Before doing so, however, I merely wanted to add in connection with the present debate on this matter that since my return, the Senator from Maryland and I have had conferences on this subject, and we expect to do everything we can within the authority of the Merchant Marine Committee to stop such shipments as have been referred to. We think a more flagrant violation exists in that many American citizens owning vessels flying the Panamanian flag and carrying American-purchased goods, are doing exactly the same thing that we are now trying to prevent in the case of vessels flying the American flag. It is even a more flagrant violation than in the latter case.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the Senator from Washington not admit, however, that if we wanted to make an effective naval blockade of the China coast, we should prevent action under any flag, whether it be British, Panamanian, Chinese Communist, or any other, in the way of unloading cargos from ships there? The only way it can be done is by establishing an effective naval blockade, in retaliation for the overt aggression which has taken place in Korea.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I agree with the Senator from California. Of course, there first comes the question of an effective blockade of the China Sea. That is one thing. I know a little bit about that. There has been blockade-running and pirateering in that area for many years, perhaps for 200 or 300 years. I think we can establish such a blockade. But I believe we should take some drastic action here in regard to American citizens who, under a foreign flag, are making money by engaging in the same kind of traffic.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. With the permission of the Senator from Washington, I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland two questions, by which I intend to reinforce the comments and observations made by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] in regard to this subject.

Mr. O'CONOR. I shall be very glad to answer.

Mr. MORSE. I have but two questions: First, is it or is it not true that the President of the United States, under the powers he has in this hour of emergency, has the authority to stop the transport of these goods, if he cares to exercise the authority?

Mr. O'CONOR. My answer to the Senator from Oregon is that, in my opinion, the President has. It was for that reason that I mentioned, in the statement I made, that it was to be hoped that the Department of Commerce would take immediate action; and, lacking that, while I did not undertake to tell the President what to do, it was hoped that he would seek the use of his emergency powers, or any other powers he might have, to bring about the desired result. In the opinion of the Senator from Maryland, I may say to my friend the Senator from Oregon, the President does possess that authority.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator from Maryland, and wish to say that I agree with his conclusion that the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief, in this hour of emergency, has that power. I desire to express not only the hope that he will exercise it but to express the thought and to make the statement on the floor of the Senate today that I think it is his clear duty to proceed to exercise that authority without further delay.

The second question I desire to ask the Senator from Maryland, which bears upon the point made by the Senator from California in respect to Hong Kong, is this: Is it not also true that in this hour of great crisis, at least for our country, so far as our boys in Korea are concerned, we have a right to call upon Great Britain to live up to her moral obligations under the United Nations, and to take the steps necessary to see to it that Hong Kong is not used as a means and a device for Communist China to carry on a more effective war against American boys in Korea?

Mr. O'CONOR. I wish to say in answer to the Senator from Oregon that I think his point is very well taken. We have already ascertained that quantities of materials much greater than have hitherto been sent to Hong Kong have gone there recently. In our efforts to ascertain their ultimate destination, we received information that unquestionably they went into Communist China hands. So I think the point made by the Senator from Oregon is undoubtedly a very good one, and I believe there is sound foundation for it.

Mr. MORSE. I may say, most respectfully, that I hope the attention of the Prime Minister of Great Britain will be called to the fact that there is a strong view in the Congress of the United States that Great Britain, through Hong Kong, is aiding and abetting the Communist Chinese in connection with the Korean War.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield so that I may address a question to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. And will the Senator from Oregon yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like in line with what the Senator has just been discussing, to inquire whether he does not agree with me that, at least with respect to some of the nations which, for some reason or other, have been unable to contribute the amount of help to meet the aggression in Korea that the Government and the people of the United States have contributed, the least they can do is to stop giving their moral and material support to Communist China? Is not that the very least they can do?

Mr. MORSE. My answer is an emphatic "Yes."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I shall yield for one or two more questions, though we have some pending business to attend to. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I came into the Senate Chamber late during this discussion, and I did not hear all of the remarks of the able Senator from Maryland and his report upon the results of the investigation he has been conducting thus far. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether, in the course of this investigation, and in his efforts to stop these shipments to China, he has had any assurance from the responsible parties, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of State, or others, that the shipment of goods and materials to China is being stopped, or will be stopped?

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I may say in answer to the Senator from Arkansas that the answer we received has been in the nature of action taken by the Department of Commerce in successive steps; which action, I again say, I regret was not taken a long time ago. Unquestionably, had it been taken, sizable quantities of these supplies would not have reached their destination. But, during the past week, if I may add this further thought, in fairness to the Department of Commerce, they took action. They took action in placing a general requirement that henceforth all shipments to China must be under licenses. But that does not mean that shipments will not be made; but that those seeking to make them must obtain export licenses.

Mr. McCLELLAN. One more question. I ask the able Senator whether in his opinion there is such lack of cooperation among the executive branches of the Government that, under the conditions now existing, it is advisable for the Congress to act immediately to stop this traffic?

Mr. O'CONOR. I may say to the Senator from Arkansas that if action is not taken in this particular case—which I think is a glaring instance, at this moment, 6 months after the Communists in Korea undertook their offensive—if action is not taken in this instance, I think the Senator will see further action in this Chamber.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I commend the able Senator from Maryland for having brought this revelation of conditions to the attention of the American people; and I may say the American people are outraged by them, and rightfully so. There ought to be some power in the American Government which can stop this character of traffic. If it cannot be stopped by the executive branch, then the Congress should act.

Mr. KEM and Mr. LEHMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield; if so, to whom?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I merely want to conclude the discussion on this point by saying to the Senator from Arkansas that this matter was, of course, called to the attention of the Senate last September by the Senator from Maryland and myself, and at that time—let us be fair about it—conditions were much different from what they are now. To follow this up, the Senator from Maryland and I are now asking for a complete embargo, not for export licenses. I feel sure we are going to find a response to this proposal. In the meantime, certain American shippers who have not been wholly at fault have been involved in this traffic; but the real fault lies—we may as well be honest about it, and I am sure that the Senator from Maryland, in view of the very able investigation which he has conducted, will agree with me—lies with the British, who are still doing business as usual through Hong Kong. That fact was called to the attention of the Senate in August by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] and myself. The Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] joined us in calling the matter to the attention of the Senate. I believe it is appropriate at this time that the Senate call the subject to the attention of the very distinguished visitor from England who is in the city today.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I commend the Senator. However, I do not know what authority we have over the commerce of Great Britain. We do have authority over our own commerce, and can control it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. We do not have any control over Great Britain's commerce. Whatever can be done is being done. It is a national disgrace that ships should be in the Far East with such materials.

The Senator from Maryland has been very vigilant, and I am certain that he will be able to get some concrete results.

Mr. KEM and Mr. LEHMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield; if so to whom?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

CONFERENCES BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT AND PRIME MINISTER ATTLEE

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and other Senators I submit a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 371), submitted by Mr. KEM (for himself, Mr. WHERRY, Mr. KNOWLAND, Mr. BRICKER, Mr. CAIN, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. THYE, Mr. HENDRICKSON, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. DONNELL, Mr. BREWSTER, Mr. NIXON, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. MALONE, Mr. DWORSHAK, Mr. YOUNG, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. WATKINS, Mr. JENNER, Mr. CORDON, Mr. McCARTHY, and Mr. ECTON), was read by the legislative clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that, after the discussions now being carried on between the President and Prime Minister Attlee have been concluded, the President should forthwith make a full and complete report concerning the same to the Senate; and that the President should not enter into any understandings or agreements with the Prime Minister which might have the effect of committing the United States to any course of action, except by treaty entered into with the advice and consent of the Senate in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. KEM. The purpose of this resolution is to prevent a second Yalta or a second Potsdam.

During and after World War II, our leaders took a so-called calculated risk that they could do business with Stalin. They gambled—and our people lost. As a result, we find ourselves in greater danger than ever before in history. The decision as to how to meet the present crisis must be sound and realistic. We cannot afford to take more calculated risks with the security of our people.

A crucial conference is now under way between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. We learn from the press that the principal items on the agenda are the rapidly deteriorating situation in Korea, and what steps are to be taken to meet the challenge of Red China and the Soviet Union.

This conference is being conducted in a supersecret atmosphere. We do not know what has been decided. We do know that the decisions made will be far-reaching in their implications. They may well mean life or death for millions of Americans.

The Congress, the elected representatives of the people, must exercise fully its constitutional duties to prevent one man, or a small group of men, from again embarking on a course of disaster.

Article II, section 2 of the Constitution provides:

> The President * * * shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

Webster's defines a treaty as "an agreement or arrangement made by negotiation or diplomacy."

If an "agreement or arrangement" results from the diplomatic negotiations now under way, it should be submitted to the Senate for ratification as required by the Constitution. That is exactly what the resolution I have introduced is designed to accomplish. Nothing more—nothing less.

I anticipate the argument may be raised that to follow such a procedure would tip our hand to the enemy. Therefore, the people must not learn of the plan agreed upon until it has already been put into effect.

Let us not delude ourselves into thinking we can be safe by sticking our heads in the sand. We spent millions of dollars in an effort to prevent Stalin from obtaining the secret of the atomic bomb. Yet one was soon exploded behind the iron curtain. It was made possible only by secrets stolen from America.

The fathers, mothers, sons, and daughters of America should know in advance what they are getting into. After all, this is our country. It is the blood of our people that will be shed. A decision reached in accordance with the principles of our Constitution should determine when and where it shall be shed.

For my part, I greatly prefer such a decision to the combined judgment of those now sitting at the conference table in the Blair House.

We have learned by experience, Mr. President, that government by guess and intuition is no substitute for government by the Constitution. During World War II, a Chief Executive of the United States entered into far-reaching agreements with representatives of powerful foreign nations, including Britain, at Tehran and Yalta. His successor entered into equally far-reaching agreements with foreign representatives, including Mr. Attlee, at Potsdam.

The calamitous Yalta deal—which sold China down the river to the Reds—was made in secret. The advice of the Senate was not obtained—and apparently not desired. And the world-shaping agreements made at Yalta, as in the case of those made at Tehran, were not ratified by the Senate, or even submitted to it. Today, nearly 6 years after the Yalta Conference, we still do not know exactly what took place.

In Potsdam, in August 1945, the present incumbent of the White House followed the example set by his predecessor. The negotiations at Potsdam, in which Mr. Attlee took part, were conducted for the most part in secret. The Senate played no part. The agreements made were not submitted to it as required by the Constitution. And again, as at Yalta, Stalin received practically everything he wanted.

Are we unwilling to learn from experience? Is it not time to put the brakes on secret huddlers? Have we not drunk the cup of unconstitutional government to the bitter dregs?

Mr. President, I have no illusions or delusions as to the superior wisdom of Members of Congress. I do have an abiding faith in our constitutional processes. When a proposed course of action is tested in the crucible of debate on the floor of the Senate or House, reports are carried throughout the Nation via newspaper, radio, and television. Editors, commentators, and columnists express their opinions. The people are able to inform themselves as to the pros and cons of the matter under discussion, and to make their decisions known, by letters, telegrams, and so forth to their Representatives in the Congress.

Only by this process can decisions be reached which represent the considered judgment of the American people.

Only by returning to tried and tested principles of government can we end the backtrack, bungle, and botch in our foreign affairs.

The Senate must reaffirm its role in the conduct of our foreign relations.

The issue is this: Are we to have a truly American foreign policy, openly arrived at within the framework of constitutional government? Or is our policy to continue to be a secret, personal substitute?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the appropriate committee. I also ask unanimous consent that the committee to which the resolution is referred be directed to report on it by Friday.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I shall have to object to the latter request, because at this time I do not know to which committee the resolution will be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I shall be compelled to object until I have had an opportunity to confer with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. Of course, the Senator from Missouri can renew his request at a later time. The procedure suggested by him at this time is somewhat unusual, and I have not had an opportunity to confer with the chairman or the ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. Until I have had such opportunity, I shall be forced to object.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection and yield to me?

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I wonder if the Senator would have any objection to a request that the resolution temporarily lie on the table and that the Senator from Missouri may renew his request after the Senator from Washington has conferred with members of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I have no objection.

Mr. KEM. That course is entirely agreeable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. It seems to me that if the subject is to be considered, regardless of its merits or demerits, the resolution should be brought before the Senate within the next few days. I commend the Senator from Missouri for asking that the resolution be referred to a standing committee, because such committee can consider the resolution and report it either favorably or unfavorably. Therefore, it is the fair way of handling such a resolution. However, in view of the subject matter involved, I should like to ask that sometime during the afternoon the acting majority leader take the opportunity to confer with members of the Committee on Foreign Relations and that the distinguished Senator from Missouri may have an opportunity to renew his request.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I think that is a fair request.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I have been informed that several other Senators would like to join in sponsoring the resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the names of such Senators may be added to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The names of the original and additional sponsors appear on the resolution as printed in the RECORD.)

Mr. SALTONSTALL subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] today submitted a resolution on behalf of himself and a number of other Senators. I wish to associate myself with the first half of the resolution, because I believe that not only should we have a full and complete report concerning the conversations the President had with Prime Minister Attlee, but we should have a full report for the people of the United States on the situation up to the present time, so far as such a report can be given without endangering the security of our troops.

I believe that when the people of the country know the facts, they can be relied upon to do the right thing, to do the courageous thing, and to do absolutely all that is necessary.

I do not wish to sign the resolution, because I believe that some agreements or understandings, other than treaties, can properly be entered into without congressional approval; but I believe that whatever is agreed upon should, insofar as can be done without endangering security, be presented as quickly as possible in a full and complete report to those of us in the Senate and to the people of the country. I hope the President will do so.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 207, which proposes to continue the provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 until February 28, 1951. As has been stated many times, Senate Joint Resolution 207 is merely a stop-gap measure designed to put off a decision which must be taken finally, but which can best be taken at another time. At the present time the Congress is confronted with other pressing problems which will require our full time between now and the first of the year. We must be prepared to answer the international challenges hurled at us, for on our answers will hang the fate of our Nation and of the free world.

My position on rent control is known to the Senate. Earlier this year I introduced a bill which would have strengthened rent control where it was needed, and which would have permitted decontrol where controls were not needed. I felt then that the time for complete decontrol had not yet arrived. I feel even more strongly today that the time for decontrol is not here.

In order to meet the international crisis which faces us, we have enacted the Defense Production Act of 1950 which gives the President authority to allocate materials, and to establish rationing, and wage and price controls. Already the organizations to exercise these controls are being set up and we are straining every sinew to increase our production to meet the deepening world crisis. Without a doubt, we shall soon see the establishment of price controls and wage controls in one form or another. In the face of these efforts to mobilize and protect our national economic structure, how can we permit rent controls to lapse? Surely it is obvious that exorbitant rents are just as inflationary as exorbitant prices. Surely it is just as difficult for the defense worker or the soldier to pay inflated prices for shelter as it is to pay inflated prices for food and clothing.

Already a trend toward increased rents has been noted in those areas where our defense efforts have necessitated the concentration of unusual numbers of persons, either military or civilian. I have in my possession copies of numerous letters from commanders of military installations, indicating the shortage of available housing facilities and deploring increases in rents. It has been pointed out that the continued accumulation of personnel around military and defense installations must continue, and that the charging of exorbitant rents will lead to extreme difficulties in obtaining the necessary personnel to man these defense centers.

In his testimony before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on this bill, Mr. Stuart Symington, chairman of the National Security Resources Board, stated:

> Recent experiences already point to some of the effects. For example, the area adjacent to Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., was decontrolled by the housing expediter in September 1949. The recent expansion of military personnel at the fort from a skeleton force to over 35,000 officers and men created a serious shortage of rental housing.

Mr. Eugene M. Zuckert, Assistant Secretary of the Air Force, corroborated this statement before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee by stating:

> Furthermore, the present emergency has made it necessary for us to recruit additional civilian personnel and to utilize their services where housing is already at a premium because of various reasons. Accordingly, any rental increases in these areas would make them unattractive to potential civilian employees and would have a very adverse effect upon our efforts to retain trained civilian personnel at these locations.

Do we really need this bill? It has been suggested by one Member of this body that the present Rent Control Act be permitted to expire on December 31, 1950, in order to wipe the slate clean so that the Eighty-second Congress may reexamine the whole issue of rent control on its merits. In my opinion, such a course of action would be detrimental to our defense efforts. It could very well be highly dangerous to our whole economic structure.

Under any conditions, whether or not Senate Joint Resolution 207 is passed, the Eighty-second Congress will be called upon to examine the entire question of rent control. Senate Joint Resolution 207 merely maintains the status quo until that reexamination can take place. On the other hand, if the present act is allowed to expire, it will mean untold hardships for our defense workers and military personnel.

The defense effort will be hampered. The present organization which is administering rent control will be dispersed and an unlimited amount of time and effort will be necessary to set up new criteria for determining rent levels, especially on those units which are decontrolled by reason of the expiration of the present act.

As I said before, this bill would merely continue the status quo. In areas where there will be no concentration of defense effort, the process of decontrol may continue exactly as it has in the past. In the controlled areas, rent increases may be granted whenever they are found to be justified. The authority of incorporated cities and towns to remove their areas from Federal controls would be unaffected.

This bill may be described as a rearguard action, a delaying action necessary to give the Eighty-second Congress time to review the whole subject of rent control. If this bill is not enacted, the Eighty-second Congress must start from scratch. If the bill is enacted, it will provide a basis from which to work. It is my earnest hope that Senate Joint Resolution 207 will be enacted into law.

THE FIGHT FOR FREEDOM IS WORLD-WIDE

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, in the light of the present critical world-wide situation it seems to me appropriate to make a few observations on some of the issues which are before those who are considering where we go from here. We are aware that there are debates today in the United Nations, and there are conferences now being held, probably at this very moment, between the President of the United States and his advisers and representatives of Great Britain, and I feel called upon by a sense of urgency to express some of the convictions I have on the problems now pending.

Let me say at the beginning, Mr. President, that what is going on is a world-wide fight for freedom. I pause a moment to address a few remarks to our guests from Great Britain. As Prime Minister Attlee said a few days ago, trouble always brings us closer together. May it always be thus. We thoroughly reciprocate his sentiments.

Mr. President, we in America are fully conscious of the great sacrifices of Europe in the cause of freedom in our time. We have seen two terrible world wars, and we have seen the countries of Europe devastated. I pay tribute to the heroism that has marked the course of the people of those countries.

We have full faith that their devotion to freedom—and I emphasize the word "freedom"—is undiminished in this time of danger. For a decade we have stood solidly with Europe in the struggle for freedom, and nothing will make us abandon Europe now. But I wish to emphasize that in unity there is strength, and we must find unity in our approach to our present problems.

Unity must include unity of purpose. America takes a world view, and we invite our friends in Europe to do the same. I submit that we cannot have one policy in Europe and another policy in Asia. Some voices are being raised asking us to abandon Asia in order to strengthen Europe. As I see it, such a course would be the utmost folly. To weaken the forces of freedom anywhere is to weaken them everywhere.

A course of appeasement in Asia, a course of rewarding the aggressor or passing over the wrongs of the aggressor, would hearten and strengthen aggressors everywhere, including those in Europe. It would strike a mortal blow at the Atlantic Pact, which we are now trying to develop and strengthen.

Freedom, justice, and courage know no races and no boundaries. If we only have the courage in this crisis to stand together everywhere and to honor our principles everywhere we will find that our strength is greater than we knew, sufficiently great to hold the front for freedom throughout the world—and I emphasize again the word "freedom."

The issue that is before us today is the clear issue of naked and shameless aggression. If I read the United Nations Charter aright, those who wrote the Charter and the countries which ratified it were determined that aggression by force should be curbed and that principles should be established and means provided to prevent aggression. I wish to refer in this connection to the outstanding address delivered by the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] on Monday, and I wish to quote, if I may, two questions he asked, which I repeat and underline. The first is:

> Are we now to take the position that human freedom is less worth supporting in Asia than it is in Europe?

That is the first question. The second question is this, and it is likewise the question of the Senator from California:

> Is aggression any less dangerous to peace because it has been committed by a larger power?

We do not hesitate to move in and take action against small aggressions. We have been trying to deal with minor aggressions all over the world, but when we have the threat of a great aggression, or the actuality of a great aggression, we are prepared, apparently, to consider the possibility of backing down for the sake of expediency, in order to be safe.

Let me say a word about the first question asked by the Senator from California:

> Are we to take the position that human freedom is less worth supporting in Asia than it is in Europe?

I had the privilege in September to be a representative of the United States at the meeting of the Interparliamentary Union in Dublin, Ireland. At that meeting I heard expressions from representatives of all the nations present, which numbered 30 or 40. Particularly there were present the representatives of the far-eastern countries. I even felt that the far-eastern countries stole the show because they asserted certain principles they were seeking to attain. They tried to point out to the western powers some of the principles we should consider in the present developing world situation. There were at the meeting representatives from India, Ceylon, Burma, Thailand, Indochina, Indonesia, and other areas in the Far East and in the Middle East. They said to us, "You western powers, which lay so much stress on human freedom, should think through seriously what we in the Far East have been striving for. We have been striving to get away from superimposed controls. We have been striving to get away from the old style of imperialistic colonialism or the exploitation of weaker peoples. All we want is to be turned loose and to be enabled to find out our own destiny, to be a part of the family of nations, without superimposed controls. We do not want to be taken over."

This was said right in an open meeting, and I talked with those representatives afterward. They said in that meeting, "We do not want to be taken over by communism as China has been taken over. But we are in danger of being taken over unless this aspiration of ours in some way is realized, and unless it is possible for the people of the east to be as free as the people of the west hope to be. All we ask is not money, not alms, but a sympathetic understanding of our plight, the sending of aid wherewith we can build up our economic security, whereby we can supply our own defense."

Mr. President, I say we cannot hold that human freedom is less worth supporting in Asia than it is in Europe. In fact it is my own judgment that the supporting of human freedom in Asia today is one of the keystones on which we can hope to build our security in Europe and throughout the world. Those in Europe who are suggesting even that we should ease up and draw away from Asia in order to be stronger in Europe are in my judgment making a basic, fundamental mistake which they will live to regret.

I am making no charges and no suggestions as to those who may be giving voice to the thought that we should do such things, but I understand it is a part of the conversations which are going on. I think our close friends from Britain must realize the dangers to themselves if they once let down in their support of the aspirations for human freedom which are the background of civilization.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Does not the Senator from New Jersey, who in my opinion is contributing a great thought to the Senate and to the American people, also feel that possibly our other ally and member of the United Nations, France, is making a mistake with regard to Indochina?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. If the Senator will permit me, I will come to his question in a few moments. As the next step in my remarks I was coming to the United Nations. Not merely the United States of America, but the United Nations has put its hand to the plow to put down aggression in Korea. British troops have been fighting with great valor beside our American forces. Is their sacrifice to be thrown away in appeasement of aggression or in withdrawing from what we have sought to do?

Fifty-three nations, large and small, have backed the bold United Nations stand in Korea. If these nations were right in opposing aggression when we were winning, are they wrong in opposing aggression now that we are in trouble?

In a short period of time we seem to have a complete turnover of the picture. There was an enthusiastic response to the call for resistance to aggression when the Korean trouble broke out last June. The United Nations took, as I thought, a correct stand, and moved in to stop aggression. My question is. Are they now to withdraw, because things seem to be going the wrong way?

Twice the aggressor has defied the United Nations. When the defiance came from the North Korean puppets, we of the United Nations fought them and prevailed. Now that the defiance is by Chinese Communists, motivated by Moscow, and the power is 10 times as great, are we to give up and say we were wrong?

There is a difference between being temporarily pushed back, as we were in Bataan, and trying to appease the situation and practically admit that perhaps we had made a mistake, and had better have done something else.

I say we must stand for the right, no matter how great the forces against us, and see it through. The very survival of the United Nations, and of all the United Nations stands for, depends on the courage and firmness in the right of its members at this particular moment.

It is my own judgment that the United Nations may well collapse if we yield or appease during the present aggression. The great danger is that we will retreat in panic. When I say that I do not mean that we may not have to make a military retreat and reconsolidate our forces, and that sort of thing. That can be done, and frequently is, as in the case of Bataan, when it was necessary to retreat and start from another point. We may have to retreat. But the danger is that we may retreat from the basic principles for which we stand, the principles on which the United Nations itself is founded. The big threat to us today is the danger of retreat from fundamental principles. This we must never do anywhere in the world. We know what those principles are. We see a violation of the basic principle of the whole United Nations Charter, which is to resist unjustified aggression or aggression anywhere.

Let me say in answer to the question asked by the Senator from New Mexico: Of course, the principle I am discussing applies to all the nations that are concerned with us in this great enterprise. They all have responsibilities. I understand that in the case of Indochina the French have tried to solve the problem and bring about a free and independent Indochina at the earliest date. It is a difficult problem.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I fully agree with the Senator from New Jersey that if principles are to apply in one place, if they are worth fighting for, if they are worth the sacrifices which are being made in Korea at the moment, then they should apply everywhere in the world.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Especially after we started with such great ideals when the United Nations was organized some 5 years ago. I believe the Senator from New Jersey is on sound ground when he states that we should not now retreat from principles. We may have to make a military retreat for the moment, but that should be done only so we can come back and fight again to carry out the principles adopted by the United Nations.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The Senator from New Mexico is entirely correct. He expresses the very thought I am trying to express.

The cause of freedom—and I again emphasize the word "freedom"—is world-wide and indivisible. Freedom can prevail only if the free people of the world are united and working together to oppose despotism in any form in which it may appear.

Our unity does not depend on any temporary success or expediency. It does not depend on where the battle lines are drawn. It does not depend on the military question of continuing the fight in Korea or making an honorable retreat, or moving back and consolidating our lines. The fact that we are forced to do that by the sheer force of numbers is no disgrace. That is one of the incidents of military operations. But I am arguing that there should be no retreat from principle, from what the United Nations stands for, for what we all stand for, and that is human freedom under Almighty God.

Mr. President, our unity lies only in our common moral purpose. If through appeasement we should surrender that moral purpose and the principles for which we stand and for which the United Nations stand, in order to gain a moment of respite in Korea or for any other reason, we would break the movement for unity of the free world everywhere. The fall of all Europe would follow soon after. We cannot afford to run to cover and safety when great principles are involved.

If we maintain our united moral purpose, the purpose of the United Nations, then from that purpose we can develop the proper strategy in every quarter of the globe. We will not always be winning, but in the end we will win if we are always in the right.

As we stood together in June against the shock of aggression, I plead that we stand together now, everywhere in the world. No matter how difficult the task may be, if we have the united will to do it, we will find the means; we will save the United Nations as the great hope of the world for a lasting peace.

During the delivery of the remarks of Mr. SMITH of New Jersey:

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. AIKEN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator at this particular moment, but he has mentioned Almighty God. I wonder whether the Senator will be so kind as to permit me to read at this time, for about half a minute, a letter with reference to God and the situation in the United Nations.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I shall be very glad to have the distinguished Senator do so, if he is willing to have his remarks appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, so that the continuity of my statement will not be interfered with.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Certainly, and I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am very glad to have the Senator from New Mexico read the letter.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, this morning's Washington Post carries a letter written by a clerygman of this city to the Post. His letter is along the same lines as the remarks the distinguished Senator from New Jersey has been making. The letter reads as follows:

GOD IN THE UN

More than 5 years ago the United Nations decided that God should not be invoked at its meetings. The chief reason for the rejection of the Creator from the momentous deliberations of this organization was the fear that any mention of the Supreme Being might be offensive to our "good allies," the atheistic representatives of the Soviet Government.

Today, as we look back on the most appalling record of futility and confusion ever presented by an assembly of presumably intelligent statesmen, it should be evident that there is a connection between the exclusion of God from the UN and the colossal failures that have characterized its efforts. Isn't it possible that if the delegates, from now on, humbly call on God for light and guidance before each session, they will be more successful? In these critical days of anxiety and fear it might be well to try this plan.

Very Rev. F. J. O'CONNELL,
C. SS. R., S. T. D., Dean of Theology, Catholic University of America.
WASHINGTON.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Let me say to the Senator from New Mexico, in commenting on the letter he has just read, that I have felt, as he implies, that what is going on in the world is a war between materialistic, communistic atheism, and the Western, Christian tradition in which all of us believe. I have always taken the position, being a man of faith, that it would have been a most enlightening and helpful and uplifting thing if the United Nations could have found a ground on which its meetings could have been opened by the invocation of Divine aid.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I thank the Senator.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. MCCARTHY obtained the floor.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me, to permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. MCCARTHY. Yes; if it is understood that by doing so I shall not lose the floor. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield for that purpose without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hill	Morse
Anderson	Hoey	Mundt
Brewster	Holland	Myers
Bricker	Hunt	Neely

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, it is unnecessary to tell the Senate, the country, or the world that America is facing the greatest military disaster in its entire history. Day by day and hour by hour the situation grows blacker, blacker for the world, blacker for the United States, and more particularly is it painfully blacker for over 100,000 American young men in Korea.

At this very moment the mothers and wives of those young men are treading deeply into the valley of darkness and despair. It is not necessary to use high-sounding works to describe the situation to our men in Korea. Those men, their mothers, fathers, and wives, see the situation in its elemental ugliness. They are face to face with facts—facts that cannot be escaped by pious platitudes. It is high time for all, including those responsible for administration policy, to get down to rugged reality, to look at conditions as they actually are today, and not as we wish them to be.

It is not too late for a realistic examination or a reexamination, if you will, of the situation to produce some lessening of the perils of those gallant men now fighting on one of the frontiers of freedom. Upon the results of such an examination we must chart a course of effective action, and we must be prompt in doing so. Promptness, Mr. President, is no less required than realism, we are like the firemen who debate while the house burns down.

In this time of peril, it is the duty of everyone—Democrat, Dixiecrat, or Republican—to work in the national interest. We are all, first of all, Americans. But it is not in the national interest to unite in support of error, or of policies that have failed. Unity then would only compound the damage of the past. World history is littered with the corpses of nations which were united behind bad leadership following the wrong course.

Let us briefly examine the three plans which this administration has used in three of the major areas of the world in the last 5 years.

No. 1: The Forrestal plan, which Truman fortunately adopted for Greece and Turkey. As we all know, the Forrestal plan, simply stated, was to give all the necessary military aid to people who themselves were willing to fight communism—enough military aid to make them strong enough to withstand international communism. While sufficient economic aid was given to make the military aid effective and workable, the emphasis at all times under the Forrestal plan was to be on military aid. The Forrestal plan, as we know, proved very successful.

No. 2: The Acheson-Marshall plan for all of western Europe, which was directly opposite to the Forrestal plan for Greece and Turkey. It consisted of giving the maximum economic aid with no thought whatsoever of any military defense of western Europe. In fact, the over-all plan was to build up the area economically and keep it defenseless from a military standpoint.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. KEM. Is it not true that the Marshall plan, as originally proposed by General Marshall, included Russia among its beneficiaries?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is certainly true.

The Acheson-Marshall plan fitted perfectly with Communist Russia's desire for a power vacuum in all of western Europe. On paper, as we know, there was a material and welcome change in the Acheson-Marshall plan for western Europe over a year ago. The change is on paper. At that time, as the Senate will recall, we voted vast sums of money for the military defense of western Europe. As of today, however, western Europe is still defenseless, while our State Department holds lengthy conferences with European leaders on such questions as whether or not an additional 500 policemen can safely be allowed to Western Germany.

No. 3: The Hiss-Acheson-Jessup-Lattimore-Vincent plan to turn all of Asia over to the Communists and to then cooperate with those friendly Communists. In other words, in one area of the world the plan was to fight international communism with economic aid; in another area it was to fight international communism with military aid; and in the third area it was to turn everything over to the Communists.

I know it is unnecessary to comment upon the fact that of the three plans the only one which has been successful from the American standpoint is the Forrestal plan as applied to Greece and Turkey. The most disastrous for America and most successful from the standpoint of international communism was, of course, the Hiss-Acheson-Jessup-Lattimore-Vincent plan for Asia. As of today the failure of the Acheson-Marshall plan for western Europe has not yet been demonstrated to the American people. Suffice to say we are creating in Europe exactly what Russia desires, namely, an area which is becoming economically prosperous, but completely undefended—a power vacuum. In Stalin's wildest and most optimistic dreams of 5 years ago, he could hardly have pictured a 5-year development more favorable to international atheistic communism.

Of the three plans the Hiss-Acheson plan for Asia should be completely and unequivocably repudiated in its every vicious detail. The Forrestal plan, which worked so well in Greece and Turkey, obviously must receive wholehearted approval; and the Acheson-Marshall plan for Europe should be completely changed so as to conform to the Forrestal plan for Greece and Turkey.

Now let us look briefly at the State Department's plan for Asia insofar as it affects the life and death of this Nation and the life and death of 100,000 of our young men in Korea—the plan to turn all of Asia over to international communism, or, putting it in Lattimore's words, to "allow them to fall, but do not let it appear that we pushed them." This plan was proceeding according to schedule until Truman on June 26 ordered MacArthur to defend South Korea. This, of course, was directly contrary to Acheson's previous public statements in which he publicly assured the Chinese Communists that neither Formosa nor Korea was within our defense perimeter, thereby inviting the Communists to move into Korea and Formosa. While it appeared upon the surface on June 26 that Truman was scrapping the disastrous Hiss-Acheson-Jessup-Lattimore-Vincent plan, actually the reversal and the scrapping did not go deep. It can now be seen that the Communists sustained only a temporary, minor loss, that is, temporary and minor unless—unless at this late date we scrap the entire Acheson plan, lock, stock, and barrel, and scrap the men who were responsible for the plan.

For example, as we all recall, part of Truman's order to the Seventh Fleet was that it prevent the Republic of China from taking any military action against the Chinese Communists on the mainland. Truman's orders to the Seventh Fleet also were to break Chiang Kai-shek's blockade of the Communist mainland. This released over a quarter of a million Communist troops which were stationed upon the mainland of China opposite Formosa.

Strangely—and rather significantly—in Acheson's speech of last week he admitted that he knew that those troops started moving north to the Manchurian border after they were assured by the Acheson-inspired Truman order that they could safely leave the China coast and there would be no danger of Chiang Kai-shek moving over.

As a result of this Acheson-inspired Truman order, at this moment a quarter of a million troops which had been immobilized on the China coast by Chiang Kai-shek's forces are now surrounding and cutting to pieces American forces in North Korea. Those Chinese Communists are using equipment which would not have gotten to them had the American fleet not been ordered to break Chiang Kai-shek's blockade of the China coast. This double barrelled action to aid the Chinese Communists was not United Nations action. It was action taken by President Truman under the advice of Dean Gooderham Acheson.

At this point I should like to pay tribute to a Senator who has been doing a most important work, and who made a great speech on the floor of the Senate today. I refer to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR]. He is performing a valuable service in attempting to stop the flow of these goods, even at this late date.

Let us keep that part of the picture clearly in mind. While the President was ordering our young men to fight and die in the battle against Communists in Korea, Acheson was saying to his Chinese Communist friends—the "agrarian reformers": "Don't worry, the Acheson hand will again be quicker than the Truman brain. I will have him sign an order under which the Seventh Fleet will make it unnecessary for you to guard the China mainland from Chiang Kai-shek's 500,000 troops on Formosa. I will insert in that order a provision forbidding the continuance of the blockade of the China coast by Chiang Kai-shek. Then you can get the necessary war matériel and oil which Chiang has prevented reaching your armies."

But that was only one of the major services which our State Department has rendered the Chinese Communists. With half a million Chinese Communists in Korea—I believe it is now 1,000,000—killing American men, Acheson says, "Now let's be calm; let's not take hasty action; let's do nothing to alienate the friendship of the Chinese Communists who are killing our men. Let's keep them friendly."

With the rim of the world on fire, with the death toll of American men mounting by the hour, the great Red Dean asks us to be calm and patient. It is like advising a man whose home is being pillaged and burned, whose family is being killed, to be calm and not take hasty action for fear he might alienate the affection of the murderers.

Such has been the blueprint for disaster. It doesn't take a military or diplomatic expert to tell the American people that if we continue with the same plans and the same planners 100,000 men will be sacrificed on Acheson's altar of double dealing, and western civilization will have been dealt a staggering blow.

So clear is the answer to the question of what can and must be done that the question almost answers itself.

First. Instead of calmness and patience with the Chinese Communists, what is needed is speedy action of the roughest and toughest kind of which we are capable. The time for patience is past. The time for action is at hand. General Douglas MacArthur should be immediately given the authority to hit the Chinese Communists wherever, whenever, and however he thinks it necessary so long as they are killing American men. We cannot and must not wait on United Nations fiddling while our men are dying. Every minute we wait means more American dead, and new agony and tears for additional American families.

Second. Give the Chinese Republic the airplanes, tanks, guns, and ammunition which are needed to supply the million guerrillas with which they have contact on the China mainland. This will force the withdrawal of vast numbers of Communist troops from the Korean battlefields.

Third. Reverse the Truman-Acheson order to the Seventh Fleet so that Chiang may make such military movements against the China mainland as he and General MacArthur consider advisable. Practically every one of our military men—in fact, every one with whom I have discussed the question—agrees that this action will force the Chinese to withdraw additional vast numbers of troops from the Korean fight, even if Chiang never moves to the mainland. If the threat is there it will force the Chinese to withdraw additional vast numbers of troops from the Korean fight.

Fourth. Reverse the Acheson inspired Truman order to the Seventh Fleet so that Chiang Kai-shek may again blockade the Communist ports, and, of course, have our Navy take part in the blockade.

Fifth. In Japan we must have immediate peace for a free, sovereign and democratic Japan with or without Russian concurrence. In these times it is ridiculous for the United States to be in the position of defending the Japanese. Japanese rearmament must proceed at full speed, but on a basis similar to that of the North Atlantic Pact. To forestall the danger of an independent and remilitarized Japan we can establish a western Pacific pact consisting of the United States, Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, Japan, and the Republic of China.

Sixth. In western Europe we should immediately shift from the Acheson-Marshall plan to the Forrestal type of plan, which was effective in Greece and Turkey—the plan to immediately build up the military potential in western Europe, creating an army not of American young men, but of European young men, including the tens of thousands of Germans and Spaniards who are willing to fight against Communist aggression. We should be done with the Acheson idea that only American boys can die in the fight against communism.

At home and abroad we can little afford projects of economic defense at the expense of military defense. Any policy or program that does not contribute to rapid and increased military strength on the part of the West cannot be in our best interests. This must be made quite clear to our European allies, for we cannot afford haggling in debate when the necessity of the times demands cooperation, wisdom, and quick action. In this connection it must be kept in mind that Russia wants uncontrolled inflation or economic collapse in the United States. We must deal with the inflation problem at home, and clearly recognize that one of Russia's war weapons is economic warfare, and that we may have gravely overreached ourselves in economic commitments abroad.

Seventh. Through the prestige of the United States and the appeal of the American ideal as demonstrated, we have an additional vast source of manpower which we must not fail to utilize. On the basis of, say, 5 years honorable American military service we should establish quotas similar to our prewar immigration quotas, but without the unfortunate oriental exclusion clauses for those who will serve our cause. Upon completion of this service these valuable allies should be granted full citizenship in the United States. Plans should be made not only to avail ourselves of this source of manpower now, but also if and when Russia succeeds in occupying western Europe.

Eighth. Request withdrawal of recognition of the Chinese Communist government by all those nations to whom we have been giving billions of dollars to strengthen them so as to resist communism.

I think it is extremely important that we notify those European nations that this is a two-way street. When we spend billions of dollars trying to aid them, when the chips are down we should be able to call upon them for something in return. Certainly it is not calling upon them for much to ask them to withdraw recognition of the government which is conducting undeclared war against our young men. Failure on the part of any of them to do so should be considered by us as proof positive of their bad faith and lack of sincerity, and that they have been obtaining our aid under false pretenses. Such aid should immediately cease to those nations who refuse this request.

We know that at Yalta we were betrayed. We know that since Yalta the leaders of this Government by design and ignorance have continued to betray us. The depth and foulness of that betrayal no man can as yet outline for those of us who are its victims. We also know that the same men who betrayed America are still leading America. The traitors must no longer lead the betrayed. The international criminals must no longer splatter the pages of history with American blood. We of America are infinitely stronger than those who betrayed us would have the world believe. We are tougher than they have the courage to admit. We are more free than they wish us to be, and we are ready to fight for what we know is right, but we must not fight under the leadership of perfumed, dilettante diplomats. We cannot fight successfully under the leadership of those who are either half loyal or disloyal to what we are fighting for.

Nor do I think that General Marshall should continue his heavy responsibilities at his advanced age, and particularly since he, too, has been heavily involved in the erroneous China policy. I cannot too strongly urge that General Marshall would be infinitely more valuable to the Nation as an elder statesman in Leesburg. If he were there his doctors would be more satisfied, and his talents would be available as needed, as are those of our other fine elderly statesmen.

Within the next few days I intend to discuss in some detail the insidious Communist Party line attacks by inspired and semiofficial press agents of the Government, and by certain of the dangerous party-line radio commenators and news columnists—attacks by the cabal that hounded Forrestal to death, and did such an efficient job of destroying Chiang Kai-shek in the eyes of the American people, the same cabal that is now making an all-out effort in an attempt to destroy Gen. Douglas MacArthur because he too, even as did James Forrestal and as does Chiang Kai-shek, stands in the way of international atheistic communism.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article entitled "Untold Facts in the Forrestal Case," written by William Bradford Huie, and published in the New American Mercury.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNTOLD FACTS IN THE FORRESTAL CASE

In the 20 months since the destruction of James Vincent Forrestal, there has been a creeping realization in this country that what happened was much more than a poignant personal tragedy—that it was a historic national disaster in which a patriot with vision was allowed to be done to death by lesser men.

The disaster is made apparent by events. Louis Johnson, for whose accommodation Forrestal was destroyed, has been loaded with sins and chased into the briar patch. We have suffered 30,000 casualties in Korea who might have been spared had Forrestal's policies prevailed. Thoughtful Americans are, therefore, remembering that it was Forrestal who struggled to arm this Nation for its commitments, and there is a growing inclination to look again at his crucifiers and their cloak holders—at those whom Time magazine identified as "disgruntled politicians, Communists, Zionists, and gossip columnists," and whom the Saturday Evening Post labeled "an ill-assorted group of ideological libertarians."

Much of the truth has thus far been suppressed, but the ghost of Jim Forrestal is not going to be laid until there are reasonable answers to such questions as these:

Why was the attack on Forrestal so reckless and sadistically savage?

Why have his papers been held secret?

Where is the report of those who investigated his death?

Why was the deposed Defense Secretary held a virtual prisoner at Bethesda Naval Hospital—a prisoner who could not be visited by his own priest?

The American people can expect some of the truth within the next few months. Unless the administration can prevent it, there will be a congressional investigation. There will be publication of such of the Forrestal papers as can be wrested from a Defense Department now headed by Gen. George C. Marshall. Meanwhile, this most recent evidence gathered by the Mercury may be helpful.

The Communists, both American and European, had good reason to hate Jim Forrestal: He hated them. He emerged from the Second War dedicated to the destruction of communism. He had opposed every concession to bring Russia into the war against Japan. He fought General Marshall's effort to force Chiang Kai-shek to coalesce with the Chinese Communists. He battled those men in the State Department who tried to give the Mediterranean to Russia. Forrestal sat up nights figuring ways to fight Communists. And he was not only willing to fight them fairly: He was willing to fight their way.

In December 1947, when France was paralyzed by a general transportation strike, Forrestal summoned his most trusted friends to Washington. He told them that necessity demanded the use of dollars in Europe for bribes. He explained that he had spent all of the Defense Department's "non-voucherable funds," as well as much of his own money, and that more was needed. His friends produced $50,000 immediately; the money was carried that night to Paris by an American intelligence officer and paid next day to a prominent Communist leader. The strike ended within 12 hours.

During the Italian elections, in the spring of 1948, Forrestal acted in the same forthright manner. We have taken much credit for our part in that first postwar victory of the west over the Reds. We prayed, we wrote letters, we sent food, we promised Trieste to the Italians—and our side won. But we might have lost had not Forrestal spent private funds on his own responsibility.

When the Italian campaign was hottest, he again summoned his friends. He warned that the election would be lost unless dollars were used to overmatch Red payments to Italian propagandists. His friends produced, in one lot, upwards of $100,000 in cash, and this was carried by a New York attorney and paid out in the most effective manner.

Before he permitted large dollar contributions to the De Gasperi campaign fund, Forrestal received a promise that never, under any circumstances, would De Gasperi allow Communists in his government. This was at a time when other agencies of our Government were still advocating a coalition with Communists in China.

When the Defense Secretary was reminded that he might suffer grave consequences if his activities were made public, he replied: "Don't worry about that. These are times that demand personal risk. I am ready to take any consequences of this action."

In addition to finance, Forrestal also employed deception. He had no authority to give American tanks to the Italians, but he was, with authority, shipping tanks to Greece. He, therefore, arranged for freighters loaded with Greece-bound tanks to "refuel" at Naples, and while the ships were "refueling," American troops in civilian clothes "broke in" the tanks by driving them down Italian streets in parades with Italian soldiers, thus giving the impression that the tanks had been delivered to Italy.

After the election a cardinal then residing in Rome declared: "The Communists blame Mr. Forrestal for this defeat. They have marked him as their No. 1 enemy. He understands them too well."

Such activities by the Defense Secretary were unknown to the American people, but they were well known to Communist agents in Washington. And these leaders hated and plotted against Forrestal because he hit them where they are weakest, in the venality of their own members. He showed them that two can play their game of justifying means with ends.

A complete report on this phase of Forrestal's tremendous activity will be instructive * * * and it will also explain some of the "sadistic savagery" of the attack on him.

While the Communists were plotting his political, if not his physical, death, Forrestal incurred the hatred of American Zionists. According to the Nation, the Zionists "deplored Forrestal's apparent willingness to place the oil of the Near East above the requirements of political justice in Palestine."

Forrestal explained his position in a letter: "If we are to safeguard western civilization in this crisis, the British and American fleets must have free access to Near Eastern oil. That is a fact, however unpleasant it may be. When there is a crisis aboard a submarine, we close bulkhead doors and drown a third of the crew in order to save the other two-thirds. I am interested in political justice in Palestine, but this interest must remain secondary to my primary interest, which is the protection of America and the west from the gravest threat we have ever faced. No minority has the right to jeopardize this Nation for its own selfish interest."

The Defense Secretary invited more leftist animosity when he opposed the Morgenthau plan for the destruction of German industry. The plan is now almost universally acknowledged to have been ridiculous.

These twin positions caused a number of writers and commentators, including Drew Pearson and Walter Winchell, to join in what the Saturday Evening Post described as reckless and sadistically savage attacks on Forrestal.

Despite the Zionist hatred of Forrestal, when the private money was being raised for the Italian and French crises, Forrestal's Jewish friends contributed eagerly and generously.

In the fall of 1948, the rest of the United States was engaged in a political campaign, but Forrestal was engaged in a campaign against the Kremlin. It was the year of the Italian elections, the French strikes, the continuing unification battle, the Berlin blockade. Forrestal, with his incredible energy, worked night and day, including Sundays. In 10 years in Washington he had 3 days vacation. He knew from intelligence reports that the Russians had ventured the Berlin blockade because the United States was in the turmoil of an election. He wanted desperately to keep the Defense Department out of the political campaign.

Forrestal was a Democrat. His father, an Irish Catholic contractor at Beacon, N. Y., had been a Cleveland man. Jim Forrestal, at Princeton, and during the years when he had made himself a millionaire in Wall Street, had remained a Democrat and a party contributor. At Roosevelt's invitation he had resigned his $180,000-a-year job in 1940 and plunged into public service with all his characteristic energy. He was admired by such diverse individuals as Harold Ickes and John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

Forrestal's relations with Truman were friendly but not warm. Forrestal was no poker player, no political opportunist, no professional Legionnaire, no practitioner of the expedient; he was busy and serious. It is possible that he, with his first-rate brain and immense, world-wide experience, was somewhat contemptuous of Truman, but he never revealed it. Instead, even when the President flatly refused to support the $17,000,000,000 budget for the services, Forrestal did not resign but remained loyal.

However, as Defense Secretary in so dangerous a period, Forrestal was convinced that he should not take an active role in trying to reelect Truman. This enraged the political gang around the White House. They reasoned in this manner: They needed money; Forrestal was the big shot in the Cabinet; he was a millionaire Wall Streeter; he had rich friends; he ought to raise money for Truman.

Thus began the slanders and libels that Forrestal was disloyal to Truman; that he had contributed nothing to the campaign; that he had made a deal with Dewey. All of these were lies. He was completely loyal. He contributed $6,000 of his own money to the campaign; he asked a number of his friends to contribute. Truman knew of his contribution; so did Louis Johnson. Two reputable Republicans can testify that he refused to discuss even the possibility of his remaining in a Dewey cabinet. But dedicated as he was to the war against communism, he did refuse to blackjack Defense Department suppliers for campaign funds.

One White House pseudo-military figure remarked: "Yeah, that rich s. o. b. has raised a million bucks to buy votes in Europe, but he's giving us chicken feed to buy votes for Truman."

It would perhaps have been better for the country if Forrestal had called in his wealthy friends and explained that he had to raise a million dollars in order to safeguard his job.

But he didn't; Louis Johnson did; so Johnson became the candidate of the Missouri gang for Defense Secretary.

The day after Truman's inauguration in 1949 the campaign to "get Forrestal" was thrown into high gear. The country has seldom seen its like. The Communists, the "ideological libertarians," the Missouri gang, and the columnists manned the mud buckets.

Forrestal was accused of having defrauded the Government in a tax case. He was, of course, a Fascist, a warmonger, a racist, a bedfellow of I. G. Farben and the German cartelists, he bathed in oil—Near Eastern variety—and he smirked over the murder of Jewish babies by Arabs. He was a renegade Catholic, and, as a climax, Pearson reported that he was a personal coward, that he had once abandoned his wife to burglars and run out of the back of the house.

At the height of the campaign a New York publicity agent was heard reassuring a client: "Don't worry; that —— —— will crack up in 30 days. He can't take what we're dishing out to him."

Why was it necessary for them to discredit Forrestal? He had tendered the customary resignation to Truman. Why didn't Truman just accept his resignation?

There are two explanations. In the first place, Truman had frightened Johnson by vacillating. When Forrestal had visited Truman after the inauguration, expecting to be fired, Truman had surprised him by saying: "Jim, I want you to stay with me. I know what you're doing, and I want you to stay on and complete the job. You have my complete support."

Truman kept stalling Johnson during January and February, and there was one bitter night for Johnson in New York when he was convinced that Truman, like Roosevelt, had betrayed him and that he wouldn't get the job.

So, in the first place, Forrestal had to be discredited in order to safeguard the job for Johnson; and, in the second place, he had to be discredited in order to make it "politically safe" for Truman to fire him. In present-day politics you can't fire a man without first maligning him.

Under different circumstances Forrestal probably would not have been upset by vituperation. But he was now a dedicated man; he was emotionally involved in his crusade to make this country strong. He regarded Truman and Johnson as political opportunists, neither of whom would hesitate to trim sail in an adverse wind. He didn't believe that either Truman or Johnson understood the realities of the world conflict. He had dedicated himself to trying to increase this country's armed force; he had defied the pressure groups, and he felt, quite correctly, that Truman and Johnson would yield to the pressure groups and actually decrease the country's armed force.

This, of course, is exactly what Truman and Johnson did—once Forrestal was destroyed—and this is the essence of the Forrestal tragedy.

The conflict raged through January, February, and March, for by the middle of January, Forrestal's friends had begun fighting back. They spent $35,000 trying to counteract the Winchell-Pearson campaign.

Forrestal's friends also tried to divide the pressure groups. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People had been brought in against Forrestal, with Walter White charging that the Defense Secretary had "delayed the end of segregation in the Armed Forces." To counteract this, the Urban League, another organization aiding the cause of Negroes, came vigorously to Forrestal's defense. The Urban League had assisted Forrestal in combatting communism among Negroes on our ships.

Responsible publishers tried to come to Forrestal's aid. Eugene Meyer dropped Pearson's anti-Forrestal columns from the Washington Post.

Because Forrestal had been reared in a Catholic home, then had drifted away from the church and married a divorcee, he was attacked as a "renegade Catholic." The office of Cardinal Spellman, which perhaps had not been entirely unaware of Forrestal's effective efforts in Europe, rallied to his defense. To show that the church backed Forrestal, it was first planned to award him an honorary degree at Fordham, but this couldn't be done until May, and Forrestal needed help in March. So it was hastily arranged for him to address the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick in New York on St. Patrick's Day.

At the St. Patrick's Day dinner, Cardinal Spellman, lauding Forrestal, went to the unusual extent of endorsing universal military training. If the Defense Secretary, the Cardinal said in effect, believes that this measure is necessary in this grave hour, then he has my support.

Forrestal's address was a sad affair, for after 10 weeks of such buffeting he was a fading man. Truman had demanded his resignation within 48 hours. He wanted the resignation to be as of April 1, but he wanted it in hand within 48 hours. Forrestal's first decision was to state his case in a long letter and release it to the press, and he asked his advisers in New York to prepare such a letter. Then he changed his mind and dictated his own brief resignation.

During March, Forrestal appeared dazed and depressed. His friends thought he might have been drugged. He talked sadly about how America was going the way of France; he predicted that American troops would be fighting within a year.

He showed interest when friends discussed with him the proposed purchase of the New York Sun. It was their plan to make him editor of the Sun so that he could continue his fight to arm America against the Soviet threat. When he went to Florida it was with the understanding that he would become editor of the Sun after his recuperation.

On April 1st Forrestal attended the mammoth swearing-in ceremonies of Johnson. He wept openly. The President insisted on decorating him—and Forrestal wept while the President was pinning on the medal, for he considered the gesture an insult. He walked back with Admiral Denfeld, weeping, and he told the Admiral that he was going down to Florida to play some golf.

On April 5th, there was a telephone call from Ferdinand Eberstadt in Washington to Robert A. Lovett in Hobe Sound, Fla. Mr. Eberstadt reported that Forrestal was ill.

"Is he very ill?" Mr. Lovett inquired.

"He is very, very ill," Mr. Eberstadt replied.

Four hours later, just at dusk, the big Air Force Constellation, the Dew Drop, circled and landed at a small, deserted field near Hobe Sound. Waiting was a single automobile in which were Mr. and Mrs. Lovett and Mrs. Forrestal. The door of the airplane was opened, the small ladder dropped.

"I looked up there and saw him standing in the door," Mr. Lovett recalls, "and he looked so pitiful. He was alone. And he didn't look like the man I had known at all. He looked like a little, old Irishman. He eyes were sunk, and I couldn't see his upper lip. As he came stumbling down that ladder I reached up and caught him under the arms."

After he had greeted the two women, Forrestal stood under the tail of the airplane and told Mr. Lovett that "they" had gotten him, that he was being followed, that his telephones were tapped, and he broke into tears as he said: "They're going to catch us unprepared, Bob; America is going the way of France."

During the evening he was quiet, but next day he was worse. Mr. Lovett telephoned Washington and Forrestal's personal attorney, John Cahill, of New York, arrived with Dr. William Menninger and Dr. George Raines. The illness was diagnosed as occupational fatigue, and Forrestal was returned to Bethesda Naval Hospital.

Just what happened during the 7 weeks Forrestal was at Bethesda may never be known, but here are a few of the strange, human, and tragic developments.

Forrestal, in his sixteenth-floor suite, spent most of his time entirely alone. Mrs. Forrestal sailed for Europe on April 12.

Two of the persons who visited the hospital and who were most interested in Forrestal were his older brother, Henry Forrestal, of Beacon, N. Y., and Msgr. Maurice S. Sheehy, of Catholic University, Washington. Henry Forrestal lives at the Forrestal home place and is a highly respected citizen. Father Sheehy, a Navy chaplain, was one of Jim Forrestal's closest friends.

Early in 1949, Forrestal had asked Father Sheehy, along with Henry Forrestal, to help him return to the Catholic Church. To facilitate this return, some investigation had to be made into Mrs. Forrestal's previous divorce and this investigation was conducted by Henry Forrestal.

Forrestal was admitted to the hospital by Capt. B. W. Hogan, and Captain Hogan noted that Forrestal insisted on being listed as a Catholic. His first request was to see Father Sheehy. This request was noted by Captain Hogan, but for reasons not yet explained, Captain Raines, the psychiatrist in charge, refused this request.

On April 12, Henry Forrestal visited the hospital and talked with his brother as well as with Captains Hogan and Raines.

"Jim looked much better than I expected," Henry Forrestal recalls. "His eyes seemed clear; he was sharp and incisive. He told me: 'I'll be all right. We'll pull out of this.'"

What worried Henry Forrestal was the confinement in Bethesda. He told Captains Hogan and Raines: "What my brother needs is not to be cooped up up there on the sixteenth floor. He needs to be on an estate somewhere, among friends, where he can walk around in the sun. He has been an exceedingly active man."

Mr. Forestal asked Captain Raines: "Is my brother fundamentally okay?" Captain Raines answered: "Yes."

Henry Forrestal also told the doctors that his brother wished to talk with Father Sheehy. Captain Hogan replied, according to Mr. Forrestal: "Yes; he has asked to see the father several times. And, of course, he will."

On May 10, 11, and 12, Henry Forrestal again visited the hospital. Meanwhile, Father Sheehy had visited the hospital six times, each time asking to be allowed to see Forrestal and each time being denied permission by Captain Raines.

Henry Forrestal confronted Captain Raines and requested an explanation. Captain Raines, according to Mr. Forrestal, admitted that Forrestal had asked to see the priest. But Captain Raines wanted the priest to wait.

"How long do you want to wait, Doctor?" Mr. Forrestal asked. "We have waited 5 weeks. Delays in such cases can be dangerous. Have you ever heard of a case where being visited by a clergyman has hurt a man?"

Father Sheehy, who is built along the lines of a Notre Dame fullback, is no man to be put off easily. After arguments with Captain Raines, Father Sheehy got the impression that Raines was under some sort of orders in the case, so he went to John L. Sullivan, Secretary of the Navy. Sullivan called Dr. Raines and was assured that Father Sheehy could see the patient "in time."

Henry Forrestal was also determined to obtain his brother's release from Bethesda. He felt that if he could get Forrestal out in the sun, on some estate, and allow Father Sheehy to talk with him, that he would recover quickly.

Father Sheehy, in opposing Dr. Raines, recalled statements by Dr. Jung to the effect that "out of hundreds of patients there was not one whose problem in the last resort was not that of finding a religious outlook on life." And again, "No patient has been really healed who did not regain his religious outlook."

For Sunday, May 22, Henry Forrestal had a travel reservation to Washington. He was going to make another effort to obtain his brother's release from Bethesda.

But it was too late. At 1:45 a. m. on Sunday, May 22, Jim Forrestal escaped from his sixteenth-floor prison to his death.

When he was buried in Arlington, Truman declared: "This great American was as truly a casualty of the war as if he had died on the firing line."

Father Sheehy declares: "Had I been allowed to see my friend, Jim Forrestal, receive him back in the church, and put his mind at ease with the oldest and most reliable medicine known to mankind, he would be alive today. His blood is on the heads of those who kept me from seeing him."

Dr. Raines has nothing to say, although a formal demand has been made on the Navy by members of Congress for an explanation as to why Forrestal was denied the comfort of his friend and spiritual adviser.

Meanwhile, the people of the United States have paid in blood for the political opportunism which destroyed Forrestal. In a few years perhaps a monument may be erected to him, and a suitable inscription might be:

"Here lies a patriot who also possessed vision. In a period of crisis for his Nation, when mediocrity was enthroned in Washington, he stood forth as a first-rate mind, a dedicated spirit, an inspiring Renaissance man who understood the realities of the world in which he lived, and who, scorning opportunism, gave his energy, his mind, and his life."

WILLIAM BRADFORD HUIE.

Mr. McCARTHY. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD in a two-page statement made by the very able junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] on November 2, 1950.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The shocking attempt to assassinate the President emphasizes the seriousness of the Communist menace within the United States.

It is the bitter fruit of the years of appeasement and coddling communism in and out of the Federal Government and makes mandatory swift separation of all subversives from Government employment. The tragic event at Blair House emphasizes the urgency for rigid enforcement of the newly passed anti-Communist law and an end to efforts of those in charge of administering the law to discredit it.

The American people want the Mundt-Nixon-McCarthy antisubversive law enforced by officials who are sympathetic to its purposes.

The Blair House tragedy furnishes ample evidence that there must be action. The American people are demanding firm action to protect the country against the Communist fifth column which becomes bolder and bolder every day.

Announcement by the President in his radio address next Saturday night that he has ordered all law-enforcement agencies to enforce firmly the provisions of the Mundt-Nixon-McCarran anti-Communist law will be reassuring to the people in their thankfulness that the President's life has been saved.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover stated to the members of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, of which I am a member, that the number of Communists in the United States has increased to over 50,000 in recent years and they have 500,000 fellow travelers.

The President should immediately order Attorney General McGrath to have every Communist leader arrested for failure to register, as is provided in the antisubversive law, and prosecuted for failure to register, as is provided therein.

All State Governors and municipal police officers no doubt will gladly cooperate.

If President Truman will now give the order to J. Edgar Hoover, head of the FBI, he will soon round up the dangerous Communists—he will get the job done.

The Blair House tragedy is a grim warning of what can happen in the United States. Action now will speak louder than words.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, again the junior Senator from Nebraska showed his great ability as a leader. Again he has hit the nail on the head. And now I ask President Truman:

With the Communist hordes massacring our boys in Korea and the whole world trembling on the brink of a war to extinction, have you had enough, Mr. President? Will you act before it is too late, or are your hands so firmly tied by the Red masters of your administration that you cannot do what the junior Senator from Nebraska and other patriotic Americans are demanding?

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD at this point an article entitled "The Case Against Dean Acheson," written by Victor Lasky. Victor Lasky is the coauthor of the Seeds of Treason.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CASE AGAINST DEAN ACHESON

(By Victor Lasky)

When Arthur Bliss Lane, former Ambassador to Poland, learned of Dean Acheson's appointment as Secretary of State, he blurted out, "God help the United States."

It was no secret, although Mr. Lane refused to discuss the matter with the press, that his perhaps undiplomatic outburst was occasioned by his bitter experience trying to block a $90,000,000 postwar loan to the Soviet-controlled Warsaw regime.

Appealing to the State Department to refuse the loan, Mr. Lane had pointed to the Red terror in Poland, the arrests of American citizens, and the crushing of all freedoms. He added: "With the greatest earnestness of which I am capable, I beg the Department not to approve the extension of any credits at this time."

Nevertheless, the loan was granted with the approval of Dean Acheson, then Under Secretary of State. It had been negotiated by Donald Hiss, brother of Alger and a member of Mr. Acheson's law firm.

As it turned out, Mr. Lane was right. The loan was used to strengthen Soviet control of Poland.

In approving it Mr. Acheson could at the very least be accused of bad judgment. But there have been many such cases, too many to be explained as mere coincidences. Taken together they constitute a pattern of behavior on Mr. Acheson's part which can only be described as serving the interests of the Soviet Union.

Lest this be considered too harsh a judgment, let it be recalled that recently an official White House spokesman, W. Averell Harriman, could charge Senator ROBERT A. TAFT with actions which further the design of the Kremlin.

It would be absurd to accuse Mr. Acheson of membership in the Communist Party. It is not absurd, however, to say on the basis of his 9-year record in and out of the State Department that he has been incapable of fully understanding the nature of the Communist conspiracy to conquer the world.

And it has been an open conspiracy, spelled out to the *n*th degree in the writings of Lenin and Stalin, in the resolutions of the Comintern, the Cominform, and various Communist Party congresses throughout the world.

Mr. Acheson seems to have awakened to a few facts of Soviet aggression and bad faith only in recent years. Yet the record was clear as far back as 1939 when Russia, in complicity with Hitler Germany, seized eastern Poland and the Baltic states. For its unprovoked aggression against Finland the expiring League of Nations expelled Russia from membership.

But even today Mr. Acheson has faith in the Soviet revolution, thinking perhaps it may get on the right track. Speaking before the United Nations Assembly, at the height of the Korean debate, Mr. Acheson said:

"This perspective takes into account the possibility that the Soviet Government may not be inherently and unalterably committed to standing in the way of peace, and that it may some day accept a live-and-let-live philosophy.

"The Soviet leaders are realists, in some respects at least. As we succeed in building the necessary economic and defensive military strength it will become clear to them that the non-Soviet world will neither collapse nor be dismembered piecemeal.

"Some modification in their aggressive policies may follow, if they then recognize that the best interests of the Soviet Union require a cooperative relationship with the outside world.

"Time may have its effect. It is but 33 years since the overthrow of the Tsarist regime in Russia. This is a short time in history. Like many other social and political movements before it, the Soviet revolution may change."

Even the Korean War, launched by a Kremlin signal, has failed to teach Mr. Acheson the facts of the Communist conspiracy. He reveals as the central point of his own ideology a studied indifference to the menace of Soviet dictatorship.

Mr. Acheson's continuing use of the unfortunate phrase, "the Soviet leaders," which presupposes they have a devoted following and are not cruel despots who rule with an iron hand—is perhaps revealing.

More revealing was his recent Freedom House speech in which he admitted that "a broad compromise" with the Soviet dictatorship was impossible—at this time. Mr. Acheson insisted that as America rearms and as American rearms Europe "negotiations become possible."

"As the strength and durability of the free nations bite into the consciousness of the Soviet leaders, some modification of their determination to achieve world domination could follow," he said.

"This would open the door on many possibilities for the peaceful adjustment of differences."

In other words, we can still do business with Stalin.

Mr. Acheson's myopia toward Stalinism has in large measure led American foreign policy to fail completely—to a point where the masters of the Kremlin now call the tune.

For the road to Korea is strewn with the wreckage of Mr. Acheson's miscalculations and blunders—the chief of which was the loss of China and its 400,000,000 people to the Soviet Union.

The incredible theory that the Chinese Reds were not real Reds but "agrarian reformers" was long the cornerstone of the Far East policy promulgated by the Acheson clique. And, according to this group, the Chiang Kai-shek regime was riddled with such corruption it could not be saved. Mr. Acheson set up standards of purity which could not be found in the New York City police department much less in Kansas City.

Despite the fall of China and the Korean mess, Mr. Acheson is still unable to come up with an affirmative Far East policy. He clings to a bankrupt program involving the eventual recognition of Red China, the disparagement of Gen. Douglas MacArthur (his ancient enemy), the abandonment of Formosa and the sabotage of Chiang Kai-shek's valiant efforts to win back his country. As a result, outside of South Korea, we do not have one trustworthy ally in Asia.

Presumably, Mr. Acheson's Far East program is based on the gamble that China's Red leader, Mao Tse-tung, will become another Tito and a thorn in Stalin's side. For Mr. Acheson seems to have an inordinate trust in Tito's brand of communism.

Meanwhile, Mr. Acheson is fighting the loan to Spain proposed by the Senate. Though so tolerant of the Red regime in Warsaw, Mr. Acheson deplores the totalitarian nature of the Franco regime.

This peculiar standard toward totalitarians extends to Yugoslavia. Mr. Acheson is more than willing to do business with Marshal Tito. Apparently the Tito police state is more palatable to Mr. Acheson than Franco's.

At the same time Mr. Acheson has constantly come to the defense of persons accused of being Communists, dupes of Communists or out-and-out Soviet agents. This penchant of Mr. Acheson's has led to widespread criticism and fear throughout the Nation that the State Department has become the haven of a Communist gang. And Mr. Acheson has done little to dispel that ever-spreading belief.

Instead he has repeatedly scoffed at such allegations. And he has constantly ignored warnings of Red infiltration of the Department. These warnings had come regularly from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and State Department security officials. At least one security officer was chastened for being "overzealous." That official, his pension at stake, took the hint and was forced into silence.

The security situation had become so frightful by June 1947 under Mr. Acheson's administration of the Department that a Senate appropriations subcommittee addressed a then secret memorandum to Gen. George C. Marshall, then Secretary of State. General Marshall, incidentally, did nothing about the matter.

"It becomes necessary due to the gravity of the situation to call your attention to a condition that developed and still flourishes in the State Department under the administration of Dean Acheson," the memorandum stated.

"It is evident that there is a deliberate, calculated program being carried out not only to protect Communist personnel in high places but to reduce security and intelligence protection to a nullity.

"On file in the Department is a copy of a preliminary report of the FBI on Soviet espionage activities in the United States, which involves a large number of State Department employees, some in high official positions. This report has been challenged and ignored by those charged with the responsibility of administering the Department with the apparent tacit approval of Mr. Acheson.

"Should this case break before the State Department acts, it will be a national disgrace. Voluminous files are on hand in the Department proving the connection of the State Department employees and officials of this Soviet espionage ring."

Yet at the height of the furor over Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY'S charges against the State Department Mr. Acheson permitted himself a flight of moral indignation before a group of newspaper editors.

Mr. Acheson accused the Wisconsin Republican of a "mad and vicious operation" in demanding the exposure of alleged Reds in the Department. Mr. Acheson insisted that his staff consisted of honorable, loyal, and clean living American men and women—presumably not including the 91 homosexuals fired by the State Department nor the several Department employees arrested on morals charges since.

Mr. Acheson's blanket clearance of all Department employees indicates clearly he is unable—or unwilling—to believe that the Soviet Union could plant agents or sympathizers in his Department. In July 1946 he told a congressional committee that many persons cited as security risks or loyalty suspects were affiliated with progressive organizations and that he would not fire progressives.

Many of these progressive organizations have since been listed by the Attorney General as subversive and Communist.

Not even a jury verdict based on a mountain of evidence was apparently enough to convince Mr. Acheson that Alger Hiss was a proven Soviet spy. As far back as 1940 or 1941 Adolf A. Berle, Jr., an Assistant Secretary of State, then in charge of the Department's security, warned Mr. Acheson about the Hiss brothers—Alger and Donald.

Mr. Berle has since recalled that Mr. Acheson "said he had known the family of these boys from childhood and would vouch for them absolutely." The record shows that Mr. Acheson permitted Alger Hiss to rise to important policy-making posts without apparently making any effort to resolve doubts as to his loyalty. And Mr. Acheson made Donald Hiss—his protege—a member of his law firm, where he still is today.

In 1945 when the FBI arrested six persons on charges involving espionage, in what has become known as the Amerasia case, Mr. Acheson went to bat for one of the defendants, John Stewart Service. Mr. Service, a State Department career officer, has since admitted turning over secret Government documents to Philip Jaffe, a known Soviet agent.

When Senator MCCARTHY revived the Service case, Mr. Service was called home from abroad for a new investigation by a loyalty board. Even before the board looked into the matter, Mr. Acheson cleared Service. He authorized a statement calling the McCarthy charges "dead, discredited, and disproven." The statement said "the sympathy and good wishes of the entire Department go out" to Mr. Service and his family. No one was very much surprised, therefore, when the loyalty board again cleared Mr. Service.

Despite his arrest, Mr. Service has won consistent promotions in the State Department. Compare this with the treatment accorded Angus Ward, a courageous diplomat of the old school who was detained for 13 months by the Chinese Reds in Mukden. Mr. Ward, who never made any secret of his detestation of the be-nice-to-Russia crowd among his colleagues, was finally rewarded with an obscure consular post in British East Africa.

Apparently Mr. Acheson can't forget or forgive Mr. Ward for snarling up his plan of recognizing Red China last year by getting himself arrested.

Another to whose defense Mr. Acheson rushed was Lauchlin Currie, one of the late President Roosevelt's "anonymous" advisers. Mr. Currie was named as a fellow traveler by both Elizabeth Bentley and Whittaker Chambers.

Mr. Currie appeared before the House Un-American Activities Committee to deny the charges. Mr. Acheson acted as his counsel. Mr. Currie today continues to have State Department backing in his various ventures.

The Secretary also came to the aid of Harold Glasser, another accused by Miss Bentley. Mr. Glasser had been a technical adviser for Mr. Acheson at the founding meeting of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. Despite the charges, Mr. Acheson wrote a letter of recommendation which Mr. Glasser used to obtain an important post in a New York charities organization.

Both Hiss brothers continue to hold his friendship which, as Mr. Acheson told a Senate Committee looking into his fitness to serve as Secretary, "is not easily given and is not easily withdrawn."

But what unsettled Congress completely was Mr. Acheson's proclamation that he would not "turn his back" on Alger Hiss, even after Hiss was convicted by a jury of his peers.

Enlightened lawmakers who would concede Mr. Acheson the human privilege of standing by a friend felt he could not disassociate himself from his official position in commenting at all. Even Senator Scott Lucas, the Democratic whip, publicly repudiated the Acheson declaration. He said it wasn't doing the party much good.

Although Mr. Acheson would not "turn his back" on a convicted traitor, he seems to have turned his back on the victims of communism—the hundreds of Americans who are being held against their will behind the iron curtain.

One of them is Robert A. Vogeler, the American businessman sentenced to 15 years in Hungary in a mock trial. According to Mrs. Vogeler, who saw Mr. Acheson to protest American indifference to her husband's fate, the Secretary spoke of "patience and fortitude" and asked her to forget a plan she had for rescue and to keep mum.

"I received nothing but empty promises," she bitterly complained to newspapermen.

Mr. Acheson's role in the case of Dr. Karl von Kleczkowski is perhaps significant. Dr. von Kleczkowski and his wife had been recruited in the Balkans for United States counterespionage by Gov. George H. Earle, of Pennsylvania, when he was President Roosevelt's wartime undercover representative.

For their work Governor Earle promised them asylum in the United States. But, when they arrived here aboard a United States Army plane, they were seized and interned as enemy aliens.

Governor Earle immediately launched a campaign in their behalf, charging that Communist influences in the State Department sought their deportation. Mr. Acheson accused them of being "dangerous enemy aliens."

Their attorney, Louis Waldman, demanded a bill of particulars which Mr. Acheson never furnished. Mr. Waldman said that perhaps their anti-Red reports on the Balkan situation had led to Mr. Acheson's antagonism. Eventually, they were deported to South America.

Also arousing considerable feelings in Congress has been the activities of Mr. Acheson's law firm, Covington, Burling, Rublee & Shorb.

In January 1947, Representative PAUL W. SHAFER accused Mr. Acheson of profiting from business the firm had obtained from foreign governments. He cited the Polish loan as an example.

"Along with the other great financial wizards of the New Deal," Mr. SHAFER charged, "Mr. Acheson has learned well how to feather his own nest while serving in a public post." Mr. Acheson denied the charge.

The firm got into the news again last February when it was disclosed that Mr. Acheson's former partner, Charles A. Horsky, was circulating a petition demanding as "imperative in the public interest" a public investigation of the "lawless conduct of the FBI."

Mr. Horsky accused the FBI of illegal wire tapping, rifling private mail, destroying evidence, and counseling false and misleading sworn testimony by FBI agents.

Although the Communist Party had launched its own anti-FBI campaign, Mr. Horsky said he abhorred communism. There is nothing in the record to indicate how Mr. Acheson felt about Mr. Horsky's crusade. But soon after its disclosure it was quietly stifled.

In August 1949, Mr. Acheson scoffed at charges that the United Nations had permitted large numbers of Soviet agents to pour into the United States in the guise of UN officials. Senator PAT MCCARRAN, a Democrat, said he had the facts to back up such charges.

A half year later Senator MCCARRAN was proved right in one significant case. The FBI arrested a Russian national, Valentin Gubitchev, an employee of the United Nations, along with Judith Coplon, a Justice Department employee, on espionage charges. Both were convicted.

But Gubitchev was allowed to return to his homeland by Mr. Acheson, despite the fact Americans were being held in Red dungeons. Presumably Gubitchev's release was effected in order to obtain the release of someone like Mr. Vogeler. But if there was a quid pro quo arrangement it never came off—at least publicly.

Events have shown that Mr. Acheson's policies have at the very least been stupid. But he is still in charge of making foreign policy during the worst crisis this Nation has ever faced. And he has remained possibly because of Mr. Truman's own inability to realize that Josef Stalin—"good old Joe," he once called him—cannot be dealt with like the boys in Kansas City.

It is this soft-headed unrealistic thinking about world affairs which has led this Nation to the shadow of catastrophe.

Mr. Acheson is not a trained diplomat. He never saw foreign duty in the State Department. He entered Government service in the early thirties as an Under Secretary of the Treasury. President Roosevelt fired him after calling him a lightweight. Mr. Acheson had opposed tinkering with the dollar.

But it would be wrong to assume that Mr. Acheson was a man with set principles. For he eventually reappeared on the scene as an ardent New Dealer. In 1941, having obtained F. D. R.'s forgiveness, Mr. Acheson entered the State Department.

Before long he took over the leadership of a large intellectual fellowship in the Department which was morally certain that eternal peace lay entirely in a sympathetic understanding of Russia. Mr. Acheson and his soulmates, including Alger Hiss, saw everything that transpired in the Soviet Union as good, or, in the light of history, forgiveable.

Adolf A. Berle, who is no reactionary, has testified how this fellowship gained the ascendancy in the Department. Mr. Berle declared under oath that in the fall of 1944 "there was a difference of opinion" in the Department.

"I felt that the Russians were not going to be sympathetic and cooperative," Mr. Berle said. "Victory was then assured, but not complete, and the intelligence reports indicated a very aggressive policy, not at all in line with the kind of cooperation everyone was hoping for.

"I was pressing for a pretty clean-cut show-down when our position was strongest, The opposite group in the State Department was largely the men—Mr. Acheson's group, of course—with Mr. Hiss as a principal assistant in the matter. I got trimmed in that fight and, as a result, went to Brazil and that ended by diplomatic career."

Other experienced diplomats got "trimmed" in that fight. Most notable was Joseph C. Grew, our former Ambassador to Japan, who resigned in August 1945 as Under Secretary to be succeeded by Mr. Acheson.

The shift proved great cause for joy at Communist Party headquarters. The Daily Worker declared that Mr. Grew's resignation meant that "the forces in the State Department which were relatively anti-imperialist were strengthened." The Communist Party had already praised the new Under Secretary "as one of the most forward-looking men in the State Department." On October 7, 1945, the pro-Soviet newspaper, PM, now defunct, declared: "Now State Department policy has a better appreciation of what the Soviet Union wants."

Possibly the left-wing newspapers had recalled the role played by Mr. Acheson at the founding meeting of UNRRA in 1943. How UNRRA, its staff heavily infiltrated by Stalinists, became a tool of Soviet conquest, is a story never adequately told.

For the scandals involving the misuse of UNRRA supplies could not be properly investigated by Congress, thanks in large measure to Mr. Acheson, even though the United States footed most of the tremendous bill.

Mr. Acheson had approved a decision to permit the recipient governments to distribute supplies without proper checking as to what became of them. This was a set-up proposed by the Russians. According to the former Polish Ambassador, Jan Ciechenowski, in his book, Defeat in Victory, Mr. Acheson not only approved it but forced the British to accept.

Thus, when the American Legion protested against further UNRRA aid to Tito, after American planes were shot down over Yugoslavia, Mr. Acheson declared that the United States had no authority to withhold supplies. And never once has Mr. Acheson mentioned the proved fact that Russia had abused UNRRA aid for her own political purposes.

And only last August, Mr. Acheson, kowtowing again to Marshal Tito's police state, saw to it that no official United States representative attended the unveiling in Arlington Cemetery of a headstone for the five young American fliers shot down over Yugoslavia.

Arthur Bliss Lane, who had warned against the Polish loan, had raised the money for the headstone in private subscriptions. Columnist Ernest Lindley, who disclosed the story, concluded: "Diplomatic delicacy has its values but it should not be permitted to interfere with official homage to the dead."

Soon after succeeding Mr. Grew, Mr. Acheson seemed to go out of his way to earn the Daily Worker's accolades. He set about putting Gen. Douglas MacArthur in his place. The general, then under heavy fire from the Russians in Tokyo, had stated that Japan was docile enough to be occupied by only 200,000 troops.

This did not set too well with the Far East Section of the State Department, whose guiding spirit was Owen Lattimore, and which sought a great social and economic revolution in Japan. Their schemes would require large numbers of troops to back the "social revolution."

In a statement described by the Associated Press as "more pugnacious than diplomatic," Mr. Acheson reminded General MacArthur that the State Department, and not he, "is determining American policy toward Japan."

For this, PM said, "Hats off to Dean Acheson * * * the leader of the younger, more progressive men in the State Department * * * who won the first round in his fight for a stern, but just, Japanese peace."

Mr. Acheson has testified that one reason he rebuked General MacArthur was that he felt the need for a liberal government in Japan—a government in whose administration the Soviet Union would have a part. At the time it was Mr. Acheson's view that the participation of the Soviet regime makes a government liberal.

In the long run, General MacArthur, of course, was proved right; but this hasn't kept Mr. Acheson from continuing a bitter feud with the general to this day. That the feud is recognized by the White House is indicated by the fact that President Truman did not take Mr. Acheson with him on his recent Wake Island junket, where he met the general for the first time.

There is nothing in the record to indicate that Mr. Acheson had ever sought General MacArthur's advice, even though he probably is one of the leading American experts on Far East questions.

Yet the State Department has been responsible for a variety of peculiar orders to the general, the most curious of which was the order, still in effect, certifying the Japanese Communist Party as one of the democratic groups to receive official encouragement.

Mr. Acheson, who played a key role in the making of foreign policy in the past decade, is no expert on the inner politics of international relations. Writing in the May 1946 issue of the American Mercury, Benjamin Stolberg, an astute journalist, recognized this fact.

"And so," added Mr. Stolberg, "our Under Secretary is constantly wetting his finger to see which way the winds are blowing. Naturally, he is wetting his finger in the atmosphere in which he moves, and that atmosphere is one of confused liberalism and Soviet friendship in the romantic sense.

"The truth is that he is not an astute and fundamental observer; his brilliance is professional, reckless, and on the surface. Nor is he a strong personality; he is sensitive to the psuedo-liberal opinions of PM, the Nation, and the New Republic, of the fashionably leftish journalists, commentators, bureaucrats, professors, and movie stars. As Under Secretary of State, he has been constantly under the influence and pressure of these waves of opinion, set in motion and manipulated by an invisible force."

A classic example of how the Acheson clique operated—how a small group fostered policies contrary to American interests, but amenable to the left—can be seen in our postwar policies toward Japan.

Prior to the Japanese surrender, the Far East subcommittee of the State-War-Navy Departments' coordinating committee was charged with preparing a statement of general initial policy relating to Japan. Mr. Acheson attended the meetings. Others from State who sat in included Joseph C. Grew; his able assistant, Eugene Dooman, and Joseph Ballantine, the director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs—all with lengthy experience in Tokyo.

These career officers felt certain that the Japanese would never surrender unless the position of the Emperor was recognized. They felt that Japan would be ungovernable if the Imperial authority was destroyed.

Although such views, at the height of a bitter war, could not be expected to have had any popular appeal, events since have demonstrated they were correct. But Mr. Acheson opposed them. And a bitter fight, the leftist side of which carried over into certain newspapers, raged in the Department—climaxed by the resignations of Messrs. Grew, Dooman, and Ballantine.

In their stead came Owen Lattimore, deputy director of the Office of War Information; John Carter Vincent, chief of the State Department's China section; and Lauchlin Currie, then with the Office of Economic Warfare.

Generally the new group advocated measures proposed in Mr. Lattimore's Solution in Asia, a copy of which was seen on Mr. Truman's desk when the President announced the Japanese surrender. Mr. Lattimore had urged the abolition of the Japanese monarchy, banishment of the Imperial family to China for life, dissolution of large Japanese enterprises and a purge of business executives.

The new leftist State Department crowd came up with a program which in effect called for the atomizing of Japanese industry into single-plant companies; taking securities from their owners for a purely nominal price; and selling them to new entrepreneurs—such as farmers' cooperatives and labor unions, many of them Communist-controlled.

But the Acheson-Lattimore-Vincent group could not sell its views on the Japanese monarchy even though, according to Drew Pearson, Mr. Acheson had arranged for Mr. Lattimore to talk to Mr. Truman on the matter. Later, Mr. Truman appointed Mr. Lattimore as a member of the Pauley reparations commission to Tokyo.

The Acheson-Lattimore-Vincent program for Japan proved unworkable and within 3 years, at the insistence of the late James V. Forrestal, it was reversed. Today the same general standards apply to Japanese business as apply to American corporations under the antitrust laws.

In November 1945, Mr. Acheson went out of his way to demonstrate his sympathetic understanding of Russia by appearing at a Madison Square Garden rally called by the National Conference of Soviet-American Friendship.

Other speakers at the rally, called to welcome the Dean of Canterbury, the Red eccentric of the Church of England, included Corliss Lamont, Paul Robeson, Albert Fitzgerald, and Joseph E. Davies.

By this time Soviet intentions in the postwar world had become unmistakable even for the most woollyheaded. But Mr. Acheson told an assembled throng of Communists and fellow travelers that "there is no specific reason to suppose" that "the vital interests of the American and Russian people" will ever clash.

"We understand," continued Mr. Acheson, "and agree with them to have friendly governments along her borders is essential, both for the security of the Soviet Union and for the peace of the world."

This could only be read to mean that the United States would oppose unfriendly—i. e., anti-Communist—governments along her borders. The record shows clearly that, except for empty protests to placate American opinion, the State Department acquiesced in the formation of Red satellites in eastern Europe. Such was Acheson policy.

The same fuzzy-minded regard for the Kremlin's susceptibilities was demonstrated by Mr. Acheson when he and David Lilienthal prepared a report on atomic energy. Dated March 28, 1946, the report looked forward to giving the atomic secret to Russia. The report declared:

"When the plan is in full operation there will no longer be secrets about atomic energy. We believe that this is the firmest basis of security; for, in the long term there can be no international control and no international cooperation which does not presuppose international community of knowledge." Fortunately, Bernard M. Baruch's commission took a more realistic view of our peace-loving Soviet allies. The Baruch plan provided for continuing inspection, free of the veto. Russia, of course, refused.

In May 1946 as Acting Secretary, Mr. Acheson announced that Soviet representatives would be permitted to witness the atomic tests at Bikini. This was an offer of cooperation the Russians did not turn down.

In September 1945, Mr. Acheson—constantly worried about the Kremlin's susceptibilities—prevented the House Un-American Activities Committee from holding public hearings in the case of Sam Carp, a brother-in-law of Soviet Foreign Minister Vyachaslev Molotov.

Mr. Carp, a Bridgeport, Conn., businessman, had been called to explain some of his business relations with the Soviet Union. Mr. Acheson, in his request to the congressional group, said such testimony might embarrass United States-Soviet relations.

It was in this period that Mr. Acheson, as Acting Secretary, broke off United States diplomatic relations with Spain. At the request of Freda Kirchwey, editor of the Nation, he received Dr. Juan Negrin, who headed the pro-Soviet wing of the Spanish Republican forces. But he refused to see cabinet members of the Spanish Government in exile who, though Socialists, were opposed to Moscow.

For some reason Mr. Acheson has an aversion toward anti-Communist Socialists. Norman Thomas has repeatedly tried to see him to give information on Socialist politics abroad—where they are of considerable importance. Yet, Mr. Acheson has been too busy to see Mr. Thomas.

On December 20, 1945, Mr. Acheson was not too busy to receive Milton Wolff, head of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade which recruited Americans to fight illegally in the Spanish Civil War. The following day the Daily Worker reported that Mr. Acheson had promised to intervene with Franco in behalf of two brigade members held in Spain.

In March 1946, Mr. Acheson snubbed Winston Churchill after the former British Prime Minister delivered his now famous Fulton, Mo., speech warning the world against the Soviet threat. Although Mr. Truman had sat on the dais when Mr. Churchill delivered his speech, Mr. Acheson's attitude was plainly shown when he refused to appear at a New York dinner welcoming Mr. Churchill. The Churchill speech had been bitterly assailed by the Communists, following Moscow's lead. It was at this time that Mr. Acheson was supposed to have discarded his pro-Soviet orientation. Why this should have been Mr. Acheson's turning point nobody knows. There is, however, the curious coincidence that the Russians were then threatening the Middle East oil fields. Mr. Acheson's law firm had long represented an important oil firm.

Howeyer, Mr. Acheson's supposed change of heart became known when he pledged American intervention in the event Iran was attacked by Russia.

However, Mr. Acheson was not too happy over the Truman doctrine which had been announced by the President in March 1947. The doctrine permitted the United States to intervene in the affairs of any nation threatened by Soviet aggression.

As the first step, Mr. Truman recommended military and economic aid to Greece and Turkey. Economic aid, under the doctrine, was to be strictly limited to the main purpose—opposing the spread of Soviet power with arms, if necessary.

On May 10, 1947, Mr. Acheson, according to the United Press, took the lead to shift the emphasis in the Truman doctrine from an ideological crusade against communism to an economic program for rebuilding western Europe and the Far East into healthy, democratic areas.

At the same time, over bitter congressional opposition, Mr. Acheson insisted that the United States deliver nearly $17,000,000 worth of postwar lend-lease supplies to Russia. Several Congressmen pointed out the inconsistency in sending such equipment while carrying out the Truman doctrine. But Mr. Acheson said the United States must abide by its contracts. Senator STYLES BRIDGES thereupon accused Mr. Acheson of talking tough out of one corner of his mouth while advocating aid to Russia out of tht other.

Mr. Acheson then made several speeches expressing the need for rebuilding the economies of western Europe. This was followed by Gen. George C. Marshall's speech at Harvard which led to the Marshall plan. Mr. Acheson has since taken credit as the brains behind the Marshall plan. And this has been constantly cited to prove how anti-Communist Mr. Acheson is.

Actually, the plan as originally worked out by Mr. Acheson contemplated enormous gifts to Russia and the east European satellites. In fact, the Red regime in Prague had originally endorsed the plan. But the Prague Communists were forced to swallow the endorsement when the Kremlin decided the Marshall plan was a Wall Street plot.

When Russia refused to play ball, the plan was proclaimed as a certain means of placing western Europe in a position to defend herself against Russia. But as it worked out, it did nothing of the sort. In effect, the plan constituted an abandonment of the Truman doctrine. The Economic Cooperation Administration sought the economic recovery of the world, but wthout military protection for nations in the Soviet line of march.

And ECA has encouraged Europeans to believe they have a right to a high standard of living without doing anything in their own behalf either to achieve it or to protect it against Moscow.

As a result, despite all the billions spent by the ECA, not a single new division of fighting men has been created in Soviet-menaced Europe to resist aggression. Yet the Marshall plan has been sold to the American people as having stopped communism.

But, as Representative WALTER JUDD has asked, "Why should we expect the Communists to keep out of western Europe when our investment of billions only makes those countries more tempting?"

The answer to Mr. JUDD's question can be found in Korea, a nation to which we provided some economic aid but no military support.

As yet, Mr. Acheson refuses to admit that the debacle in China was a major defeat for American foreign policy. Our goal was, or should have been, the promotion of a free, friendly and democratic China. Instead, we are confronted with a China, which was never less free, less friendly, and farther from democracy.

And Mr. Acheson is still continuing his suicidal feud with Chiang Kai-shek, the still-recognized head of a friendly anti-Communist foreign power. As recently as last July 30, Mr. Acheson was quoted as declaring:

"The idea is loose in our country that we are all-powerful and can dictate world affairs. That assumption leads to the belief that, whenever something goes wrong, some American official must be at fault.

"The Red capture of China was so regarded by many. Actually, China's fall was solely the fault of Chiang Kai-shek; he refused all friendly advice, lost every vestige of his popular support, and was ultimately taken to the Communist cleaners."

In one breath, Mr. Acheson states grandly that we cannot "dictate world affairs" and, in the next, he berates Chiang for refusing "all friendly advice," presumably American demands he make his peace with the Reds and clean out "corruption."

Mr. Acheson is quick to discover corruption in governments pledged to fight communism. Last January he accused the Philippine Government of misusing American funds. The speech came when Communist-led Hukapalahaps roamed the countryside spreading death and destruction.

The official Philippines' reactions were interesting. Declared President Elpidio Quirino: "I deplore the insinuation that the Philippines may be a second China."

Finance Secretary Pio Pedrosa lashed back with the accusation that any misuse of funds was the fault of Americans who participated in graft in the disposition of surplus property.

"I will not be surprised," said Mr. Pedrosa, "if, sensing that the Philippines might be lost to democracy because of fast developments in Communist Asia, the United States State Department may not be preparing to ease the United States gracefully out of the picture by issuing a white paper on the Philippines—the first inklings should be the supposed misuse of this $2,000,000,000 aid."

Mr. Acheson has played an extremely important role in the shaping of United States policies in the Far East. In the fall of 1945 he and his Director of Far Eastern Affairs, John Carter Vincent, wrote the instructions and the President's statement which sent Gen. George C. Marshall to China on his ill-fated mission.

The first draft of the President's statement asserted that the United States would do no business with Chiang, unless he made a deal with the Communists by taking them into his government. Only when the War Department protested was the statement watered down to read that the United States would support the Nationalist Government "so long as it moves toward peace and unity."

For the War Department well knew, through its own intelligence sources, the real nature of Chinese Communists and their complete control by Moscow. But its G–2 reports were discounted by the "wiser heads" in the State Department. And not one of them appears in Mr. Acheson's white paper on China.

Presumably Mr. Acheson now knows well the fate of the coalition-with-Communists policy in Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Czechoslovakia. Yet, despite the lessons of eastern Europe, Mr. Acheson has constantly denounced Chiang for refusing to have anything to do with Soviet agents.

For that refusal the Republic of China was punished. From 1946 to 1948 the State Department clamped down on aid to the Nationalists. On March 20, 1947, Mr. Acheson, arguing against aid to China, told Congress:

"The Chinese Government is not in the position at the present time that the Greek Government is in. It is not approaching collapse. It is not threatened by defeat by the Communists. The war with the Communists is going on much as it has for the last 20 years."

Meanwhile, the Soviet Union was sending a steady stream of arms to the Chinese "agrarian reformers"—and their counterparts in North Korea. Finally, when the war-weary Chinese Government forces were cracking up under the strain of new onslaughts by the freshly armed Red troops, the United States began sending a trickle of counterbalancing supplies.

But this was not the picture painted in the white paper on China released by the State Department on August 5, 1949, with a statement that it was salient and frank.

The New York Times thought otherwise. An editorial on the white paper declared:

"It is not unfair to point out that such a summary cannot possibly be objective. The Department will not inform the President that this effort over which it has labored is inadequate or misleading. It will not take the position that the policies it has shaped have been mistaken. This inquest on China is not the work of a serene and detached coroner but of a vitally interested party in the catastrophe. Unfortunately, at this point, one of these vital interests is self-justification, which certainly is the enemy of objective analyses."

In his letter of transmittal to the President, Mr. Acheson asked the American people to accept the proposition that the terrible failure of United States policy in China was not the responsibility of United States diplomacy. The self-serving document reached the astonishing conclusion that nothing the State Department did or did not do contributed to the ominous result.

The plain truth is that the white paper is merely the wrapping for a black record of failure. It is a masterpiece of omissions, evasions, tricky half-truths, sly slants and twists to create misleading impressions and to conceal grave misjudgments. Its publication marked the lowest point ever reached by American diplomacy; the nearest thing to political bankruptcy a great power can acknowledge.

The editor, selected by Mr. Acheson, was Prof. Philip C. Jessup, whose main qualification for the job apparently was his long association with the American Institute of Pacific Relations. An expert on international law, Professor Jessup had no direct experience in the Far East.

The IPR was the chief instrument used by the Communist Party to conduct a vigorous propaganda campaign aimed at discrediting the Republic of China. For many years Dr. Jessup's close friend, Frederick Vanderbilt Field, the millionaire Communist, was the institute's executive director and financial angel. Under Dr. Jessup's direction the institute's publication published many pro-Communist articles. A. T. S. Bisson article, referring to the two Chinas, declared:

"One is now generally called Kuomintang China, the other is called Communist China. However, these are only party labels. To be more descriptive, the one might be called feudal China, the other democratic China."

Dr. Jessup, listed as a sponsor of several Communist fronts, was also a friend of Alger Hiss and, in fact, appeared as a character witness for Hiss at his perjury trial. Perhaps this stood him in good stead with Mr. Acheson, who has used the professor on many vital assignments, the most important of which was the editing of the white paper. By its publication:

1. Mr. Acheson committed an impulsive act against a fully recognized government of a great power, a fact which undoubtedly made every other government wonder if it must conform to our every recommendation on pain of being castigated in a white paper, a fact suggested by Mr. Pedrosa of the Philippines.

2. Mr. Acheson performed a post-mortem on a still-living organism. He used a history book to influence history. He accused a friendly government of every conceivable crime—dishonesty, stupidity, thievery, bad faith, corruption—while we sat with representatives of that government in the UN and counted on its votes to support us in the Far Eastern Commission.

3. Mr. Acheson, moreover, painted the Communists as men of virtue, whose only real fault is that they were working in the interests of Russia. And he completely discredited the Chinese anti-Communists, which by the white paper's own documentation, were waging a war against communism while Mr. Acheson was still entranced by Edgar Snow, Owen Lattimore and Alger Hiss.

4. And Mr. Acheson wrote off any and all elements of the Nationalist Government with whom we could have worked out some form of united action. In effect, he gave a kind of de facto recognition to the Red conquest of all China, which was not then actually a fact. This "recognition" gave enormous strength of the Communist elements in Southeast Asia, a territory which Mr. Acheson piously announced the United States would defend—by appealing to the UN.

Nowhere in the white paper is there the frank admission that the State Department had promoted the myth that the Chinese Reds were agrarian reformers. This fundamental error, and its evil consequences, are covered up. There is the pretense that the State Department knew all along how wicked, totalitarian and subservient to Moscow the Chinese Reds were; and how necessary it was, for America's vital interests, to save China from the Reds.

The white paper itself, however, smashes this pretense. Buried in the extracts are portion of memoranda of John Davies and John Stewart Service, State Department career officers who were the most bitter critics of the Chiang regime.

The time was 1943–1945 when the tide had turned against Germany and Japan. Russia was free to spread her totalitarian poison. At this crucial juncture the Davies-Service team began thumping the drum for the Chinese Reds. They reported how the Reds were wholeheartedly fighting the Japanese and promoting a wonderful, popular revolution. Short on documentation, they were long on enthusiasm. Typical quotes:

"This (Communist) revolution has been moderate and democratic. It has improved the economic condition of the peasants, * * * given them democratic self-government, * * * freed them from feudalistic bonds."

"The Chinese Communists (have) moved away from world revolution to nationalism. (They) have positive and widespread popular support, phenomenal vitality and strength. (They) are genuinely of the people."

There is no indication from the Davies-Service dispatches, which had profound influence on the making of our Far East policies, that the Chinese Reds were ruthless totalitarians, practicing terror if necessary, suppressing civil liberties, and adept at the most rigid thought control.

Messrs. Davies and Service stated frankly they wanted the United States to abandon Chiang and his legitimate government. They argued that just as Winston Churchill had publicly proclaimed support for Marshal Tito, President Roosevelt should proclaim support for Mao Tse-tung. Only this, they said, would force Chiang into a coalition with the Communists.

All this, reading like folly now, can be found in the white paper, unrebuked and seemingly unnoticed by Mr. Acheson. But the Davies-Service line was the basis for Mr. Acheson's incredibly intemperate castigation of the Nationalist Government. Among other things, Mr. Acheson stated that the Nationalists had starved their people; had made no effective effort towards a progressive government; had sunk into corruption, reaction and a scramble for place and power; had lost the confidence of the people; and had decayed to the point where their troops had lost the will to fight. The Nationalist armies, said Mr. Acheson, "did not have to be defeated; they disintegrated."

Mr. Acheson, as usual, did not document these sweeping indictments. He did not put corruption in the frame of perspective or balance it against a war-corroded economy. Certainly corruption existed in China, as it exists here. The Chinese call it squeeze and cumshaw; Americans call it 5 percenters and deep freezers. It was exposed and fought there; as it was here.

How did Mr. Acheson weigh confidence in China? Apparently not by the 33,000,000 Chinese refugees from Communist territory, who sought haven in Nationalist territory.

They couldn't all be landlords and reactionaries.

Mr. Acheson excoriated the Nationalists for not promoting constitutionalism. In 1947–48, Chiang led his people toward a democratic constitution and their first experience in popular voting—but the Secretary of State brushed off this progressive effort, that is, if he had heard of it.

The Chinese Reds had themselves provided the answer to Mr. Acheson's charge that the Nationalist armies did not fight. Their official New China News Agency estimated Communist casualties at 1,432,900 in 3 years. Of these, 622,000 were suffered from July 1, 1948 to July 1, 1949—the crucial year, according to Mr. Acheson, when the Nationalists had disintegrated.

The white paper does contain one important, less black picture of Chiang. It was drawn by China's foremost scholar, Dr. Hu Shih, one-time Ambassador to the United States. In December 1948 our Ambassador reported he had talked with Dr. Hu. He said:

"The conversation with Hu was especially saddening because he represents the finest type of patriotic idealism in his attempt to be loyal to the Chiang government. Hu's argument is that communism is so implacable and intolerant, so diabolically thorough in its indoctrination and so ruthless in enforcing its totalitarian control even in China that Chiang Kai-shek should be supported despite his shortcomings because he alone sees this and has been uncompromising in resisting it."

Dr. Hu perceived, as Mr. Acheson still does not, that bad as the Nationalist Government might be, it cannot be as bad for China—and the world—as communism. In politics the choice is not likely to be between good and bad, but between the lesser of two evils.

But nothing in the white paper is more sickening than its misrepresentations of the amount of aid the United States sent the Nationalists. The aid supposedly sent amounted to $2,000,000,000. According to the white paper it was tossed down the rathole of Nationalist corruption. But when the listing is examined, it is clear that none of it, save for the $400,000,000 military-economic program forced on the State Department by Congress in 1948, was actually designed to combat communism.

The other items include lend-lease equipment provided the Chinese to combat the Japanese. UNRRA benefits which are listed were for postwar relief and rehabilitation, of which Red China received a share. The surplus property sales, by express order of General Marshall, did not include weapons to fight armed communism.

Underlying all the figures of aid is, of course, the basic attitude of the State Department's China experts. The white paper annexes are studded with their shrill warnings against aid lest Chiang use it to fight the Reds. In a monstrous twist of animosity these pro-Communist partisans now blame Chiang for using aid ineffectively against the Communists.

For its own purposes the white paper makes much of the steady deterioration of morale in Nationalist China. Yet, the fact is that United States diplomacy delivered blow after blow to Nationalist morale—climaxed by the white paper. For the mighty American champion of world freedom had singled out the Nationalist leaders as too contemptible for encouragement. Yet Mr. Acheson could say, with a straight face, that the State Department had "pursued vigorously the objective of assisting the Nationalist Government."

And now Mr. Acheson has decided to abandon Formosa. He had already written off the island fortress prior to the Korean War. In a secret memorandum smoked out by the United Press last January the State Department advised its attachés abroad to sell the public the idea that Formosa was of no strategic value.

Politically, geographically, and strategically, the memo said, Formosa "is in no way especially distingushied or important." This was not the State Department view on June 3, 1945. The State Department bulletin then stated that "with the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position" as does Formosa.

Neither is it the view of the top military strategists. Gen. Douglas MacArthur, in the Formosa statement the administration wanted to suppress, had stated that "the occupation of Formosa by Communist forces would be a direct threat to the security of the Pacific area and to the United States Forces performing their lawful and necessary functions in that area."

But Mr. Acheson doesn't think so and by his recent actions he again undermined anti-Communist hopes in China. Time-Life correspondent John Osborne, reporting last October 2 from Formosa, quoted a member of the Chinese Nationalist cabinet:

"If I could see Mr. Acheson tomorrow morning, I would ask him just two questions. Does he want us to live, or does he want us to die? Does he want us to grow strong on this island, or does he want to throw us off this island?"

Representative HUGH SCOTT, on his recent return from Korea, reported that American troops there wanted to know: "What about this guy Acheson? Is he on our side?"

They had good cause to wonder.

While American troops were fighting a bitter war in Korea Mr. Acheson's be-nice-to-Russia policies continued. Even the American Federation of Labor rebelled at Mr. Acheson's desire to continue business as usual with Russia and her satellites. Said A. F. of L. President William Green last September:

"We should stop shipping goods to Russia and other Communist countries because they will use them to prepare for war against us."

But Mr. Acheson persuaded Mr. Truman to condemn the refusal of A. F. of L. longshoremen to unload Soviet-manufactured furs and crab meat on American docks. Mr. Truman announced that he and Mr. Acheson were making foreign policy—not the longshoremen.

It was Mr. Acheson's foreign policy which led directly to Korea.

On January 12, 1950, in a speech before the National Press Club in Washington, Mr. Acheson virtually abandoned Asia to Russia.

Mr. Acheson declared that our defensive perimeter runs along the Aleutians to Japan and then goes to the Ryukyus. This policy statement immediately ruled out any defense of Korea or Formosa—both lying above that perimeter.

Mr. Acheson jeered at Senator ROBERT A. TAFT's proposal that we send a fleet to protect Formosa against Red invasion. He said he didn't realize that the Ohio Republican was a military expert.

Prior to that Mr. Acheson had sanctioned the withdrawal of American troops from South Korea. Had our occupation of Korea continued possibly the North Korean attack would not have taken place. Had the attack taken place, however, our troops who landed there last June would have had adequate bases, supplies, and equipment at hand.

Following the American withdrawal, Mr. Acheson announced: "If South Korea were invaded, our attitude would be that South Korea would be able to resist."

Mr. Acheson, whose sole military training consisted of several months in the Navy during World War I, had never consulted with General MacArthur on Far East policies. Instead it was Owen Lattimore who was asked by the State Department for advice on what to do in the Far East.

And Mr. Lattimore, in a secret memorandum to the State Department, proposed that Korea should be allowed to fall without making it look as if the United States had pushed it. Syngman Rhee to Mr. Lattimore was just a little Chiang Kai-shek.

With this background, the masters of the Kremlin thought they would face no United States opposition in taking over Korea. But they miscalculated. For President Truman, disregarding Mr. Acheson, decided that he had been pushed around enough by the Russians.

But Mr. Acheson's appeasement policies continued. Although we pledged our naval and air power to prevent a Red invasion of Formosa, we prevented Chiang from continuing offensive operations against the Red-held mainland. And we rejected Chiang's offer of American-equipped, battle-hardened Nationalist troops for Korea.

According to Mr. Acheson, the question of Formosa's ultimate fate will be settled by the United Nations, thus paving the way for an inevitable impartial high-level junking of Chiang's right to maintain his government on Formosa.

This was recognized by General MacArthur in the statement to the Veterans of Foreign Wars Mr. Acheson sought to suppress:

"Nothing could be more fallacious than the threadbare argument of those who advocate appeasement in the Pacific that if we defend Formosa we alienate continental Asia. Those who speak thus do not understand the Orient."

Throughout the Korean episode Mr. Acheson did his utmost to appease Red China. About the only action taken toward the Peiping regime—which did as much as Russia to encourage the North Korean aggression—was to concede it was a mistake for an American plane to have strafed Red Chinese territory.

The game was to do anything to keep Red China out of the Korean war. The Chinese Red leaders, adept at the art of blackmail, demanded as their price United Nations recognition. And, according to Senator STYLES BRIDGES, Mr. Acheson agreed—playing a double game in that he assured the American people he would oppose such recognition. But everything points to the fact that Mr. Acheson has already agreed, in behind the scenes' maneuvering at Lake Success, to such an outcome—following the November elections.

While Mr. Acheson appeased, General MacArthur won the war in Korea. But it took American forces 3 months, many ignominious reverses and heavy casualties before they could take the offensive. It was a miracle that General MacArthur's small and poorly equipped forces escaped another Bataan.

This is the Acheson record. This is the record based on information already made public. What the hidden record is—what Mr. Acheson has done behind the scenes—the American people may never know.

But one thing is certain even if Mr. Acheson is eventually forced to resign by an outraged public opinion.

For any lasting reform of our foreign policy the State Department will have to be thoroughly cleansed of 9 years of Mr. Acheson's influence. For at no time in American history has the prestige of that Department sunk as low as it now sags under Dean Acheson. A drastic house cleaning is in order.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Our American Duty," published in the Milwaukee Sentinel.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR AMERICAN DUTY

The blundering and disloyal foreign policies of the New Deal are taking this country into complete disaster, both military and economic.

Our sovereignty has been impaired by making us a virtual vassal of the United Nations, which disrupts our councils, and seeks to fly its mongrel flag over our public buildings.

Our wealth is dissipated to support socialism abroad and to defend alien peoples who are not willing to defend themselves.

The lives of our young men are being sacrificed in a desperate war which our purported allies are not trying to help us win on the battlefields and are conspiring to make us lose in the mazes of diplomacy and duplicity.

For our own survival it is imperative that we extricate ourselves from these destroying situations at once.

Without even inadequate support from others in the United Nations we are fighting almost alone against massed hordes on the Asian continent.

Continuing the war means only the slaughter of millions in a Quixotic American attempt to conquer a vast and distant population.

First and foremost, therefore, this country should withdraw its armed forces from the invasion areas.

We should get our troops out of Korea as quickly as possible.

We should come home to our own country, reconstruct our defenses, and give heed to our own security and welfare.

This might be a defeat for the New Deal, which is responsible for our dismal plight.

It would not be a defeat for the United States, but merely an act of self-preservation.

Secondly, we should get out of the United Nations.

That organization has not sustained us in the war that we undertook in its behalf.

Instead, it has interfered with our operations.

Furthermore, it is conniving to admit the enemy into a privileged membership where the enemy could dictate peace terms.

Accordingly, the United Nations should let Red China in—and leave the United States out.

Then let the United Nations see how it gets along.

This country has maintained the United Nations since its inception, with no return in loyalty or gratitude.

So let those who run the United Nations pay for the United Nations—and fight its wars.

Finally, we should end our unrequited efforts to support and supply an ingrate Europe.

Even England, our supposedly staunch ally, has not genuinely backed us in our solitary United Nations war, nor assisted us elsewhere.

On the contrary, Marxist England formally recognized the Chinese Communist government and collaborates with Marxist France in preventing an European rearmament.

Europe has intimated it no longer wants our martial help.

This is Europe's attitude, let Europe look out for itself, and see how Europe gets along.

Since obviously we stand alone, we should have the wisdom and the courage to act alone.

For our duty is to protect our own people and to foster our own Nation.

Mr. McCARTHY subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the remarks I made earlier today, a letter which I wish to read. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield for that purpose?

Mr. CAIN. Yes; if I am permitted to do so, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCARTHY. Incidentally, Mr. President, the letter I am about to read is not apropos of what the Senator from Washington is now discussing, but it has to do with the remarks I made earlier this afternoon.

The letter comes from Pfc A. J. Mullen, who has been in Korea. I think we should keep his letter in mind as we watch the fiddling of the United Nations while it debates whether we are at war. This letter comes from a young man who knows we are at war. I read the letter:

DEAR MA AND DAD: I'm on my way home, but I'm bringing some bad news with me. I hope you don't take this so hard as some people do.

I went to Korea and got wounded in both of my legs and they had to be amputated. I don't remember exactly how it happened—I only remember the explosion and the hospital at Inchon. They are in good condition at the present and it will be no more than a month before I will see you all again.

I am on the General G. M. Randall at sea. I'm relieved to get away from it all, mom and dad, and there will be something to look forward to when I see you people again. The only thing that I'm worried about are you folks. I don't want you to be worrying and going around with tears in your eyes. The best years of my life are ahead of me. For your information, they amputated from my knees down.

Well that's all for now. The rest can wait. I'll be writing you more often now, and once again I beg of you to keep cool and I will see you soon. Please excuse the handwriting as I am a bit shaky at the present.

I will write again soon.

Your loving son,

BOB.

Mr. President, I do not think the letter needs any comment. I wish to commend it to the reading and consideration of those who are debating whether the Chinese are at war with us.

FREIGHT FORWARDERS AND MOTOR COMMON CARRIERS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5967) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, to clarify the status of freight forwarders and their relationship with motor common carriers.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, the Senate has now before it for consideration House bill 5967, which has been passed by the House by a very substantial margin. The bill deals with a problem which has been before the Congress for many months and which has received the attention of both the House and the Senate Committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The bill, which was reported by the House committee unanimously and by the Senate committee by a very substantial majority, is before the Senate at this time because in the opinion of those who favor the bill it involves a problem which must be solved. So the bill should be considered at this time and passed by the Senate.

Mr. President, House bill 5967 would solve a pressing and important transportation problem. As I said, the prompt solution of the problem is a pressing necessity at this time. The House agreed to certain amendments, which have removed all valid objections to the bill. The bill simply maintains the status quo.

Mr. President, the bill deals with a highly technical matter, which would take some time to discuss. It is a matter, however, which has received the attention of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in very lengthy hearings, during which all sides of the question were discussed. It deals with the problem of freight forwarders.

1. THE PROBLEM WHICH THE BILL SOLVES

Freight forwarders have been regulated as carriers under Federal law since 1942. Shippers throughout the Nation depend upon the coordinated service which forwarders provide in the transportation of less-than-carload-lot freight. Forwarder service is of vital importance to both the domestic economy and the defense effort of the Nation.

That service is threatened by an interpretation of the statute which regulates forwarders.

The interpretation, made by the ICC, holds that the statute does not define forwarders as common carriers, but as agencies of transportation having a similitude to public utilities. Based on that view of the status of forwarders, the interpretation further holds that an important phase of the business, whereby forwarders coordinate their services with those of motor carriers, under flexible agreements for hauling forwarder freight in truckload lots between forwarder stations, must be discontinued. This practice has existed, openly, satisfactorily, without complaint, and with great advantage to the shipping public, and, I may say, to the little shipper, for more than 30 years.

The order making this interpretation has been postponed from time to time pending enactment of corrective legislation, or similar corrective legislation such as that which is now before us, and is now scheduled to become effective May 1, 1951.

The bill cures the problem by clearly recognizing forwarders for what they are, and have always been, namely, common carriers similar to the American Express Agency.

Further, it authorizes continuance of the practices which have evolved and proved their worth over the years, and recognizes them for what they have always been—contracts.

2. PROMPT SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEM IS A PRESSING NECESSITY

The maintenance of an adequate and efficient transportation system, in all its aspects, has perhaps never been of more critical importance to the Nation. No one questions that freight forwarders fill an important place in our transportation system. Heavy use of forwarders is made by all the armed services and defense establishments, and by all the shippers of the country.

In addition to providing a coordinated and expedited transportation service which is not otherwise available, the forwarders are of tremendous importance in the conservation and efficient utilization of the existing facilities of other carriers. Rail boxcars are today in critically short supply. Statistics show that freight-forwarder cars are loaded approximately twice as heavily as cars loaded with ordinary less-than-carload-lot freight, which is what forwarder traffic consists of. Forwards also enable motor carriers to make much more efficient utilization of their equipment by eliminating dockings, loading more heavily, and eliminating unnecessary paper work, transfers, and the like.

It would be foolhardy to permit artificial and unnecessary barriers to cripple freight-forwarder service, particularly at this time.

Mr. President, in connection with the original bill, the House considered several amendments which removed some objections made by the railroads and others involved, and those amendments are now contained in the bill. It is my understanding, from reading the House hearings, the testimony of those who appeared before the committee, that the opposition to the original bill on the part of some railroads—not on the part of all—has now been removed, and they have so testified. After the amendments were placed in the bill, and after the factual data was placed in both the House and the Senate committee reports, the House committee unanimously reported the bill, and it was passed by the House by a very substantial margin.

All the bill does, as I said, is to maintain the status quo which now exists in our transportation system. Some argument has been made to the effect that possibly we might wait a period of time in order to make a study of the whole transportation system as it involves freight forwarders and all the other methods of railroad transportation and truck transportation. I believe at this time that would be somewhat disastrous, because all the bill does is, as I said, place the matter in status quo. If we decide, after sufficient study of the transportation systems' problems, that we want to make some changes we can do so in another bill.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will act on the bill promptly. The ICC has had the matter before it for many, many months. Lengthy hearings have been held by the Senate committee. The subject is highly technical. Most of us have come to the conclusion that the bill should be passed in order to retain the freight forwarders in the position they now are.

As I said, the amendments which were proposed were agreed to by the railroads of the country who at first were opposed to certain portions of the bill. The purpose of amendments is to keep our transportation system and important segments of that system alive.

Freight forwarders play a great part in the life of the small shipper. A freight forwarder does not operate in the main with carload lots. He picks up various lots from the outlying districts and combines them into a carload lot and ships them to another small point that could not take advantage of a terminal point.

I wish to read from the hearings before the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. Small business was represented in those hearings. This is what was said on behalf of small business regarding this service which we now seek to keep in status quo. I read from page 312 of the hearings:

Small business needs forwarder service because, as even those opposing the bill admit—

Reference is made to the original bill prior to the adoption of the amendments—because, as even those opposing the bill admit, it is the only l. c. l. service available on small shipments which combines fast, dependable schedules at standard—not premium—rates. In other words, if your local shoe store did not have forwarder service to move its 150- or 200-pound shipments, it would have to turn to express, air, or some other high-cost means of transportation in order to get its goods shipped on time.

The hearings are replete with testimony of small business which have taken advantage of the freight-forwarder service during the 40 years it has been in existence. It is a vital part of the transportation system. I hope the Senate will promptly pass this bill. It has been the subject of much highly technical discussion for many many months. If, after further study it is desired that a change be made, such a change can be made in a new transportation bill.

Mr. President, I have used a portion of a statement dealing with the matter. I now ask that the remainder of the statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remainder of the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

3. HOW THE HOUSE AMENDMENTS REMOVE VALID OBJECTIONS

Based on its own comprehensive hearings, as well as the record of the Senate hearings on companion bill S. 2113, the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce undertook to remove all valid objections to the bill by making four major amendments, as follows:

1. A requirement that no contract, between any freight forwarder and any motor carrier, shall unduly prefer or prejudice any other freight forwarder. This amendment is designed primarily to protect smaller forwarders. Some fears were expressed that large forwarders would be able to make more favorable arrangements than small forwarders, and this amendment effectively allays such fears.

2. A requirement that contracts shall be consistent with the national transportation policy. Despite the fact that the national transportation policy governs each provision of the act, some persons feared that the bill might abrogate or bypass that policy, and the amendment insures against such a contingency.

3. A requirement that forwarders pay full tariff rates of the motor carriers for linehaul movements in truckload lots for distances exceeding 450 miles. Testimony shows that such arrangements now, and in the past, do not generally apply for distances exceeding 450 miles. To meet the objections of some who feared that disruptive changes in practice might be made in the future, the bill includes the distance limitation. This does not limit the use of trucks for any distance, but places a limitation on what the forwarder must pay for such service. In effect this provision merely maintains status quo.

4. A provision the effect of which is to require forwarders to recover any claims they have against the railroads on the basis of the terms of the bill of lading. This is the method declared lawful by the Supreme Court, and again this amendment is merely a status quo provision.

These amendments satisfied all members of the House committee, which unanimously reported the bill as amended. The House of Representatives then passed the bill on August 9. Thus H. R. 5967 comes before the Senate as a compromise and as a substitute for S. 2113 it should receive prompt Senate approval.

The few remaining objections are not directed specifically at the purposes of the bill, but stem from a competitive opposition to freight forwarders as such. The objectors come primarily from the ranks of long-distance truck operators who do not work with forwarders but only compete with them, and from some very large shippers who in the main conduct their own forwarding operations. Their arguments, such as that the bill is "legislative rate making," and authorizes "cut rates," are spurious and misleading, for the bill does not involve rates which the public pays but relates to joint arrangements between carriers.

4. THE HEARINGS DEVELOPED ALL FACTUAL DATA

Nine days of public hearings were held by the Senate and House committees handling the bills. Every interested person in the United States had full opportunity to present his views. The hearings have been printed and are available for all to see.

Without attempting to analyze the testimony presented at the hearings, it is sufficient to say that the freight forwarding industry is unanimously and strongly in favor of the bill; that every shipper who testified that he makes regular and substantial use of freight forwarder service supports the legislation; and that without a single exception the actual motor carrier operators who testified were enthusiastically in favor of passage of the bill.

Opposition to the bills as introduced was expressed by the national trucking organization, whose witness admitted that there was a divided opinion among the members and that those motor carriers who cooperate in the handling of forwarder traffic favor the bill. The shippers who opposed the bill were either large shippers or shippers so situated that they can and do ship their own carloads or combine with others to ship in carloads, and who do not need the services of forwarders. Three large railroads opposed the bills as introduced, but the record indicates conclusively that these railroads have no opposition to the bill as amended by the House.

The House committee report (No. 2489) states very positively that:

"Testimony was given in the hearings both for and against the bill. Most of the objections to the bill have been removed by the amendment made by the committee."

There was complete unanimity within the committee in approval of the amended bill.

5. THE BILL MERELY MAINTAINS STATUS QUO

H. R. 5967 is essentially a bill to maintain status quo. It does not change any existing practice, but presents an interpretation of present law from disrupting a service that has long proved its worth to the shippers and the Nation.

Pending studies regarding long-range governmental policy in the transportation field will not be adversely affected by passage of the bill. Since the bill does no more than maintain a service as it has been built up and operated for 35 years or more, it will serve the purposes of such studies by preventing interim changes.

The facts overwhelmingly demand prompt passage of the bill. We need and must have the best that transportation has to offer, and H. R. 5967 is a constructive proposal of the utmost urgency and timeliness.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, at the last session of the Senate, when this bill was on the calendar and ready for consideration, I held up its consideration for two principal reasons: First, I am opposed to further diversion of traffic from the rails to the highways until the completion of a further extensive study, which is now under way, in regard to the cost of truck transportation on the highways, the damage to the highways, and whether the truckers are bearing their proper proportion of the cost of the original construction and the maintenance of the highways.

Of course, this bill deals with freight forwarders, which, as the Senator from Washington stated, have rendered an extremely constructive service to the shipping public during many, many years. Heretofore the freight forwarders have used the rails for their freight-forwarding business, getting the advantage of the lower rate for carload lots, as compared with the less-than-carload-lot rate which would be charged to the individual shipper were it not for the intervening freight forwarder.

I am opposed in principle, then, to further diversion until that study is completed. Such a study is now under way.

The last suggestion of the Senator from Washington was to the effect that if there is not a satisfactory solution of this problem by means of the bill now before the Senate, the bill, if passed, can be changed and amended when the general Transportation Act comes before the coming Congress for consideration. As to that suggestion, it is my hope that proper attention will be given to the matter at that time.

In the second place, this bill would end the confusion which now exists over the very nature of freight forwarders, as to whether they are common carriers or whether, because of their operations, they are in the nature of a public utility, chargeable with a public interest, and therefore subject to regulation. There is confusion at the present time, and there would be greater confusion if the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission were issued. That order has been held up for many, many months now, possibly running to a year, at the request of the committee. So the effect of the bill would be constructive.

The House adopted an amendment which would limit the distance of freight-forwarder shipments by truck to 450 miles, as I recall, so that transcontinental transportation over the highways by truck would not be available, and therefore the field of railway carriers would not be further invaded.

Not wishing to interfere with the established use of freight forwarders, and realizing that the next Congress will have this entire problem under consideration, and in view of the further fact that we should not hold up the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, at this time I shall offer no objection to the passage of the bill, looking to the report of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which is now being prepared along with a general Transportation Act, in connection with which all the problems which are involved in this bill can be considered.

So, Mr. President, although I oppose in principle any further diversion, and although I also oppose a further invasion of this field and a legalizing of that which has been developing in it over a number of years, in spite of those objections I shall not at this time oppose the passage of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill (H. R. 5967) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, a corresponding Senate bill, Senate bill 2113, will be indefinitely postponed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—AMENDMENTS TO RAILWAY LABOR ACT

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, heretofore I have given notice that we would take up certain bills. One of them is Senate bill 3295, a bill to amend the Railway Labor Act. Before I move that the Senate consider that bill, perhaps we should have a quorum call.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, let me make inquiry of the distinguished majority leader. I hate to suggest that the Senate take a recess at this time until tomorrow. I wonder whether there is any other bill the distinguished majority leader intends to bring up today. If other bills which are ready for consideration can be handled today, then, if it meets with the approval of the majority leader, perhaps he will agree to have the Senate make the bill proposing amendments to the Railway Labor Act the unfinished business. Of course, there is a unanimous-consent agreement to have the Senate vote at 2 o'clock tomorrow on the rent-control bill. Thereafter we could proceed with debate on the amendments to the Railway Labor Act.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there are two other bills in which the Senator is interested, one being House bill 9313, amending the Agricultural Act of 1949.

Mr. WHERRY. If the majority leader will yield, let me say that I think one Member on his side of the aisle is very much interested in the consideration of that bill.

I am not averse at all to having that bill considered. I think the distinguished majority leader has another bill in mind, and I am not averse to having it considered.

I shall not object further to the taking up of the bill proposing amendments to the Railway Labor Act; but if that measure is considered, I sincerely request that the majority leader end the session for today following the making of that measure the unfinished business. In other words, I suggest that we follow procedure similar to that which we followed yesterday afternoon. Such a course will provide a day in which Senators who are interested in that measure will be able to return to the Chamber. If that is done, we shall proceed with the debate on that measure, regardless of any other considerations.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, ever since the beginning of this short session we have been trying to get the Railway Labor Act amendments considered by the Senate; but every time we are ready to proceed with that measure, it seems that some Senator who is interested in the bill is unavoidably absent. I assume that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] is one of the Senators who is vitally interested in the bill. However, I have given this notice, and it seems to me we should proceed with the bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I do not intend to object; in fact, I have cooperated with the majority leader in attempting to have considered the bill proposing amendments to the Railway Labor Act. However, in order to be able to advise Senators who are interested in the measure, I should like to have that much time.

On the other hand, if the majority leader wishes to have the Senate proceed with that measure, I am in complete accord. I believe that those who wish to bring forward proposed legislation should be given their day in court, so to speak, and I shall not oppose further a move to consider the bill. Therefore, if the majority leader wishes to move consideration of the bill, that will be agreeable to me.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded and that further proceedings under the call be suspended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, it is apparent that we cannot take up for consideration Senate bill 3295, to amend the Railway Labor Act and to authorize agreements providing for union membership and agreements for deduction from the wages of carriers' employees for certain purposes and under certain conditions. I have conferred with the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] and other members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and I am advised that there is now in process an attempt to effect a settlement, through negotiations among various members of the labor unions which are vitally interested in the bill, and it is believed that perhaps by tomorrow at this time a mutual arrangement can be effected which will be satisfactory to everyone. So I am not going to ask that the bill be considered now. It seems to me we might well take a recess.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. I know that the Senator from Washington desires to make a speech.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. There was considerable confusion at the time the Senator from Illinois made his statement, and I did not hear everything he said relative to the railway labor bill.

Mr. LUCAS. I said the railway labor bill would not be made the unfinished business at this time. We shall not take it up until after we have concluded consideration of the rent-control bill, which will be tomorrow. It is my understanding that prior to our taking up further the railway labor bill Senators who are interested in the measure will perhaps be able to effect a conciliation with respect to the provisions of the bill, to the end that everyone who is concerned with it will be satisfied. If such result should be achieved, we should not have much trouble passing the bill, and it may obviate consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER], which perhaps would take considerable time to discuss.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I very much appreciate the observation of the Senator from Illinois, because several Senators on this side of the aisle are intensely interested in having the railway labor bill come up for consideration. Perhaps a conciliation can be effected. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his statement.

AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1949

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to state also that Calendar No. 2578, the bill (H. R. 9313) to amend the Agricultural Act of 1949, dealing with the disposition of certain surplus property, will not be taken up until after next Tuesday. I am advised by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] that on Tuesday next a meeting will be held by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and he believes that at that time all members will be in a position to report a bill which will be somewhat different from the present bill and satisfactory to all members of the committee. Am I correct?

Mr. ELLENDER. A few moments ago I received a letter from the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to the effect that he had made an interim report on the present status of certain perishable agricultural commodities under the supervision, management, and control of the Commodity Credit Corporation, and that the report would be ready for presentation to the whole committee on December 12. Therefore, I believe it is advisable that further action on the bill (H. R. 9313) be postponed until after the meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on Tuesday next.

FINNISH INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on December 6, 1917, the Finnish Diet and Senate drew up a declaration of independence from Russia. Dear little Finland is small in population and small in territory, but it is great in integrity and valor. It is a small nation, but it maintains principles of freedom and liberty which I wish some of the larger nations of the world might possess today.

As today, December 6, is the thirty-third anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of Finland, I would not want to let this opportunity pass without paying a brief word of tribute to the great Finnish people and to the wonderful values which they symbolize. We of Wisconsin are proud of the men, women and children of Finnish descent in our great State, and I know that is true of other States which are blessed by these splendid Americans.

Mr. President, I have prepared a statement on the occasion of the anniversary of Finland's independence, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, Mr. WILEY'S statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

FINLAND'S INDEPENDENCE

On December 6, 1917, the Finnish Diet and Senate drew up a Declaration of Independence from Russia. This followed by two months the advent of the Bolsheviks to power in Russia, after which a period of strikes and other chaotic conditions existed throughout Finland with the people desperate to realize their dream of sovereignty. The dream was realized and the Bolshevists on January 4, 1948 declared that Finnish independence conformed with their policy whereupon Sweden and other Scandinavian countries similarly acknowledged the new state.

The pages of Finnish history record thereafter the bloody travail in which the newly born state secured its sovereignty against tremendous odds at home and abroad. The birth of Finland amidst the First World War and following immediately upon the Russian revolution has symbolized the fact that this valiant people has had to fight for its very existence against a background of violence in that corner of the world and elsewhere. Yet the Finns are a people who represent the finest traditions of men working out their destiny and developing prosperity by dint of Herculean labor. The Finns to every American represent thrift, diligence, honesty, and integrity. Their practically miraculous record of payment of debts to our country is a record that is inspiring to all those of us who prize the tradition of fidelity to one's pledged word, fidelity to contracts, fidelity to one's obligations.

Although practically in the mouth of the Communist Russian bear from the very day they were born, the Finns have shown the world that a people with iron in its spine can face up to any challenge. A people which has suffered the most grievous losses on the battlefield, the most ruthless destruction of their homes, the most tremendous of financial reparations, can somehow by dint of courage and sacrifice come back.

I don't suppose in the pages of American history there are chapters of Americans being thrilled to the sagas of another country—chapters which compare with the thrills we felt in our hearts when that tiny little country with its few millions of people absolutely defied the massed hordes of Red Army troops for month after month until at last in 1940 they succumbed to the overwhelming numbers. Even though defeated, even with the cession of territory, even with the granting of special rights, even with the financial burden of reparations upon them, the Finns somehow have held fast to their democratic traditions; have controlled the few Communist traitors in their midst.

In this period when things look so gloomy from so many angles, in this period when men's hopes sink and spirits sag, let us all turn for a few moments at least to contemplation of this brave land and this brave people who have shown us conclusively the immortal heights to which free men and women can rise in selfless sacrifice to great ideals.

I salute the freedom-loving people of Finland with their great history. I salute Americans of Finnish descent who can glory in the background of their forefathers. I pray that the independence which they won and maintained in blood, sweat, and tears will ever be theirs.

God bless valiant Finland, and may she ever be an inspiration to all other countries, large and small, and may she ever show that the light of freedom will definitely not go out, no matter how strong the forces of darkness.

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF RAILWAY LABOR BILL—ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, before I ask the question which I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader, I wish to comment on the reference of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] to the very courageous nation of Finland. I desire the RECORD to show that there are thriving communities and cities in Finland which are north of Ketchikan and Juneau, Alaska. I desire the RECORD to show that the Territory of Alaska occupies practically the same position on the globe with respect to parallels of latitude as the entire Scandinavian peninsula. The Scandinavian peninsula supports in prosperity and freedom 13,000,000 people.

Apparently the Senate of the United States is unwilling to give consideration to the statehood bill, which would clear the way for the development under our flag of similar prosperity to that which is enjoyed by the people in Finland.

However, Mr. President, I rose to ask my friend, the majority leader, and through him the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], who was on the floor at the time I rose, but who apparently now is absent, what the prospect is for an agreement on consideration of the railway labor bill. I was advised by friends of the railway labor bill that an amendment had been worked out and would be presented to the Senate this afternoon.

Mr. LUCAS. In reply to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, I should like to say that I believe the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] was eager to talk to certain Republican members of the committee, who apparently did not attend the meeting of the committee, in order to see if they would agree to the amendment.

However, Mr. President, I give notice now that in the event we pass the rent-control bill tomorrow afternoon, or as soon as we pass it, I shall ask unanimous consent to consider the railway labor bill. If unanimous consent is not granted I shall move its consideration. I should like to dispose of the measure. I should also like to be able to take up for consideration the Alaska statehood bill. I would do so in preference to taking up the railway labor bill if I thought there was the slightest chance of passing the statehood bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me say to my good friend, the majority leader, that when the policy committee of the majority party assembled last September before the Senate recessed we agreed upon an agenda. We agreed upon certain bills and upon the priority with which they would be taken up. The railway labor bill had priority over the statehood bills, because it was understood that there would be no objection made to the consideration of the Railway Act amendments to be proposed. That was my opinion at the time. I was one of the Senators who gave full support to the railway labor bill. However, shortly before the Senate recessed it became apparent that there would be obstacles to the passage of the bill; first, a motion to recommit the bill, and protracted discussion of the motion, and, second, an amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER].

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that when the members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and other Senators have agreed to the amendment to which the majority leader has now alluded, it will be possible to pass the bill. I shall cooperate in every way I can to have it disposed of, particularly because we gave it priority before the Senate recessed, and it was postponed because it was obvious that we would get no action on it. I have had a very definite feeling that the railway labor bill has been proposed at this session only for the purpose of preventing action on the statehood bills. If I correctly understand the distinguished Senator from Illinois, I am glad to know that after action is taken or is not taken on the railway labor bill, we may entertain the hope that a motion will be made to return to a consideration of the Alaska statehood bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I entertain the hope that we may be able to return to consideration of the statehood bills provided we can get concrete and definite action on them. However, it is my impression from what I have learned from various Members of the Senate that probably after we finish consideration of the rent-control bill and perhaps the railway labor bill, the Senate will then be considering some emergency legislation dealing with the Korean situation, which I understand will be reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Of course if such legislation comes before us, I presume we will have to give our attention to it in preference to a motion to consider the Alaska statehood bill.

I say very sincerely that I share the views of the able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] with respect to the admission of Alaska and Hawaii into the Union as States. However, as I stated once before on the floor of the Senate, I am a realist about certain matters. Having served in the Congress for 12 years—and I know the Senator from Wyoming has served even longer than that—I think I know exactly what is going on with respect to the statehood bills. If a motion were to be made to take them up debate would begin and would continue until Christmas, in my judgment. As I said before, it is a little too late for me now to start to try to break up a filibuster. Someone else may do it if he so desires, but not the Senator from Illinois. I am sure if a filibuster started the Sergeant at Arms would have to get the Senator from Illinois out of bed. I have never believed in filibusters around the clock. I do not believe in them now. So long as the rule exists, there is no possible chance, in my judgment, of getting a vote on the Alaska statehood bill at this short session. It is apparent that certain Senators will not permit us to vote even on the motion to consider the Alaska statehood bill. Even after we took up the bill we would still have a siege.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understand the Senator from Illinois to say that in his opinion certain Members of the Senate are so opposed even to the consideration of the statehood bills that they would talk and prevent the consideration of any other measure rather than permit them to come before the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator correctly understands the Senator from Illinois. There can be no doubt of it. I have talked with certain Members of the Senate, and that is exactly what is going to happen. That is the reason why I have been moving along with some other bills, of a minor nature, in order to accomplish something at the short session. I do not propose to sit here all day long and listen to speeches, many of which have nothing to do with the subject matter at hand, so far as Alaska statehood is concerned.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It becomes clear that if there is to be action on any of the other bills, it will be only because the sponsors and friends of statehood are not following the example of those who will not permit consideration of a motion to consider a bill, or allow the motion to come to a vote.

Mr. LUCAS. I concur in what the Senator has said with respect to the statehood bills. Furthermore, the Senator is absolutely correct in the statement as to what was agreed upon by the Democratic policy committee before Congress adjourned in September. The railway labor bill was the one which we agreed to consider first. However, everyone knows about the message which came on the opening day from the President of the United States, definitely requesting the Congress to give first priority to the statehood bills, over all other measures. That is why the Senator from Illinois sought consideration of one of the statehood bills on the opening day. I desired to see whether or not we could at least get an opportunity to vote on the measure at some time. However, as I have previously stated, apparently that cannot be done. I do not propose to delay action upon other measures, of either major or minor importance, which we might possibly get through, simply to kill time when we cannot accomplish anything.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wonder if the majority leader is in a position to give us now some information with reference to what bills may be taken up.

Mr. LUCAS. As the Senator well knows, tomorrow at 2 o'clock the Senate will vote on the rent-control joint resolution. Following that we are to take up the railroad bill. That will probably require the remainder of the afternoon. Probably some measures dealing with the Korean War situation will be reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations tomorrow. If so, they can be taken up on Friday.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wonder if the Senator can tell us when we may expect consideration of the tax bill.

Mr. LUCAS. I cannot tell the Senator that. I can only speculate, as a member of the Finance Committee, which started hearings today. Probably the hearings will last all week. We may not be able to reach the tax bill until the latter part of next week.

Mr. CHAVEZ. As I understand, it is the purpose of the majority leader that some bill, whether of great importance or not, will be taken up.

Mr. LUCAS. The tax bill?

Mr. CHAVEZ. No; not the tax bill. I refer to bills on the calendar. As I understand, the Senator proposes to take up certain bills on the calendar in order to carry on the work of the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct. There are other bills. There is one very important bill in which the Senator from Wyoming and other Senators are interested. It relates to an amendment to the Clayton Act. I have given notice that we may take up that bill if we encounter a lull in the proceedings.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I am very much interested in the statement made by the majority leader that possibly the tax measure will not be brought up until the latter part of next week. That will be the week of December 11.

Mr. LUCAS. Yes. I am only guessing in that connection.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask for the judgment of the majority leader. Does he intend, in the event the tax bill is reported the latter part of next week, to hold sessions straight through Saturday, which is the 16th? There will be only 1 week left before Christmas.

Mr. LUCAS. I cannot answer the Senator. I do not know when the tax bill will be reported.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it possible that sessions will be held on Saturdays?

Mr. LUCAS. I may say in response to the Senator's inquiry that it is my studied judgment, after considering all the measures of an emergency nature in which the executive branch of the Government is interested, that we shall be here probably right through the Christmas holidays. We shall probably take a couple of days' holiday.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it the judgment of the Senator that the Senate will probably hold sessions on the two remaining Saturdays in order to complete its business?

Mr. LUCAS. If it is necessary I shall try to hold the Senate in session on Saturday. I know that the Senator from Nebraska will cooperate with me in that connection.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY TO REPORT ON SENATE RESOLUTION 368

Mr. CAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. The matter I desire to present to the Senate entails a unanimous-consent agreement. Senate Resolution 368, submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The matter came to my attention for the first time this morning. I have consulted the staff of the Committee on the Judiciary. The resolution involves much more than appears on its face. The matter is an intricate one. It seems to me the Committee on the Judiciary should have a little more time to consider the questions involved, and not be compelled to report on the resolution on Friday of this week.

What is more, some of the members of the Judiciary Committee are out of town. I have issued a call for a meeting of the committee tomorrow morning. I am very much concerned whether it will be possible to have a quorum present at that time.

I wonder whether it would be possible to have at least the majority and minority leaders present, so that I might ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the committee may have until 1 week from today to report. The matter is highly important and is of grave concern. It should receive serious study. I find it not too easy to answer the problem as one might think.

For the reason I have stated, I hope I may obtain unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have until 1 week from today in which to make a report on Senate Resolution 368.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wonder whether the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion.

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly.

Mr. CAIN. I came but recently from a meeting of the Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee of which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] is chairman. The statement which I have been making will take me 15 or 20 minutes to complete. I am perfectly willing to proceed as rapidly as possible in presenting my statement, in order that I may return to the subcommittee meeting, so that the Senator from Tennessee may come to the Senate Chamber to resolve this question, in which he has such a deep interest.

Mr. McCARRAN. I would certainly agree with that suggestion. I bring up the matter now only because of the time within which we must report. I thought it best that I bring up the matter today in some way, if possible.

Mr. CAIN. Certainly. I think the Senator from Tennesee would desire to come to the floor and to be here with the Senator from Nevada as soon as possible.

Mr. McCARRAN subsequently said: Mr. President, day before yesterday, I believe it was, there was submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary Senate Resolution 368, which, among other things, reads as follows:

Whereas the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce has reported to the Senate that subpenas have been issued for certain persons named in the body of this resolution, and that these persons are important witnesses necessary to the investigation being conducted by that committee pursuant to Senate Resolution 202, Eighty-first Congress, second session, and that the said persons have not been located despite diligent search, and that the committee has reasonable cause to believe that the said persons will not appear in response to subpenas but will continue in hiding to avoid appearance before the committee; and

Whereas the appearance and testimony of the witnesses named in the body of this resolution is material and necessary in order that the committee may properly execute the functions assigned to it and may obtain information necessary as a basis for legislation:

Then follows a list of names, after which appears the following language:

That, for the purpose of executing warrants issued in accordance with this resolution, the Sergeant at Arms may, by blanket order or orders, deputize all law enforcement officers of the Federal Government; and

That the Special Senate Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce may discharge any of the persons taken into custody under authority of this resolution upon proper assurance, by recognizance or otherwise, that he will appear for interrogation when required. The committee may require such assurance as it deems necessary not to exceed $25,000 for any one witness.

The order submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary was that the committee report not later than Friday of this week. In the short time I have been present in the Senate today, having returned only this morning, I have investigated the question involved and find it to be one of serious moment. It is not to be lightly dealt with. It is a question of the arrest of persons by the Senate of the United States, or by a committee thereof. I respectfully submit to this body that it should not be dealt with lightly or in a brief time.

I move that the Judiciary Committee be allowed to and including Monday, December 18, 1950, in which to report to the Senate. I am advised that this is a privileged motion, that I have a right to make it; I therefore make it as a privileged motion.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. WHERRY. Does that in any way displace the legislation that is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that, inasmuch as it is a privileged motion, it does not displace the pending business. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion having been agreed to, the request of the Senator from Nevada is now in full force and effect.

Mr. McCARRAN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. LUCAS subsequently said: Mr. President, a moment ago the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary made a motion to extend the time within which the committee may report on the resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER]. The motion was to extend until the 18th of December the time within which to report.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I voted in favor of the motion of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. At the time there were only five or six Senators on the floor. I do not wish to ask for a quorum call at this late hour, but I think that in all fairness if some Senators do not agree with the action taken, because so few Members of the Senate were present, they should have an opportunity to file a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to. I have the highest respect for the Senator from Nevada. I voted in favor of his motion. I am not holding any brief or portfolio for the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], who offered the resolution. He is well able to defend his own position. However, in view of the small attendance, I suggest that the motion should not be made at this time without first having a quorum call. I shall not ask for a quorum call, but in view of the small attendance I believe Senators who do not agree with the action taken should have their day in court.

Mr. McCARRAN. If ample time were available, I believe the Senator from Nebraska would be justified in taking the position which he now takes. However, it is only a question of asking for more time.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand, and I voted with the Senator from Nevada. I believe the Senator who offered the resolution ought to have an opportunity to defend his cause. I am for the Senator who is making the investigation. I am not here to uphold his hand, but the Senator from Nevada knows that there are no more than seven Senators on the floor at the present time. We are confronted with a motion which will practically bar further consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion.

Mr. McCARRAN. I will withdraw my motion if the Senator from Illinois will withdraw his motion.

Mr. LUCAS. If the Senator from Nevada withdraws his motion, of course, I shall also withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Both motions are withdrawn.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 207) to continue for a temporary period certain provisions of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington wishes to address himself to Senate Joint Resolution 207, which will be before the Senate for action tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock. The Senator from Washington opposes the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 207 for the following 10 reasons:

First. Federal rent control does not expire December 31, 1950.

Second. Rent control continues in eight-hundred-odd cities within 32 States, Alaska, and Puerto Rico from December 31, 1950, to June 30, 1951.

Third. Senate Joint Resolution 207, as of this afternoon, affects only 1,600 cities with less than 4,000,000 rental units.

Fourth. Those 1,600 cities, by their actions, to date, have indicated that they do not want Federal rent control.

Fifth. Those 1,600 cities have had since June 1950 the opportunity to request an additional 6 months' extension of Federal rent control.

Sixth. Those cities still have until December 31, 1950, to request an extension.

Seventh. Those cities can regulate rents, if needed, at their local level. Examples are Columbia, S. C., and Flint, Mich.

Eighth. Rent control will not produce one single unit of housing.

Ninth. Passage of Senate Joint Resolution 207 repudiates the local-option provision given American communities since April 1949.

Tenth. No witness heard was in opposition to further extension, and no testimony was presented by opponents.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington will not detain the Senate for very long, but does desire to address himself to the pending business and point out to his colleagues the complete lack of any provable necessity requiring the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 207.

As one of but many within the Congress throughout the past 4 years who has been in sturdy opposition to the Federal Government remaining in the private-property-management business long after wartime emergency controls had ceased to exist in every other segment of American enterprise, I do not on this afternoon propose to reexplore, reexamine, or rediscuss the broad field of Federal rent control—its evils, its maladministration, its constitutionality, or its artificiality. Rather, Mr. President, I propose to place before the Senate on behalf of those millions of property owners solid and, I believe, compelling reasons why the proposed legislation is not needed, cannot be justified, and is contrary to the best interests of our present huge national preparedness undertaking. I remind my colleagues that no single word was heard by the Banking and Currency Committee in opposition to this joint resolution. Those qualified to sincerely and seriously speak for American property owners were not invited to appear and testify.

Mr. President, let me now read just one short sentence from the committee report. We find this statement on page 2, the eighth line of the last paragraph:

> It is primarily these approximately 4,000,000 units which will be affected by this joint resolution.

What and where are these estimated 4,000,000 units? They are the estimated number of rental-housing units located in some 1,600 cities, towns, or villages of over a thousand population which have not yet, as of this date, requested the additional 6 months' Federal rent control permitted in the present law. Some 800 cities, with an estimated 3,500,000 rental units, have, as of this date, asked for the additional 6 months of Federal regulation.

So, Mr. President, I again quote the short sentence found in the report, for it correctly states the very heart and soul of the proposed legislation:

> It is primarily these approximately 4,000,000 units which will be affected by this joint resolution.

The present law does not expire on December 31, 1950. The present law remains operative in 32 States, Alaska, and Puerto Rico. It continues to be in effect in more than 800 American communities whose population is 23,000,000 people. It is, therefore, clear that Senate Joint Resolution 207 is not needed to extend the present law, as many Senators appear to think is necessary.

Senate Joint Resolution 207 merely would continue to impose on 1,600 American communities a Federal control which they have said they do not want, which they have indicated they do not need. Since April 1, 1949, the date of the Housing and Rent Act of 1949, Congress has given, in that act, the States, the counties, and the cities of America the right of self-determination with respect to Federal regulations. Nine States have exercised that "States' rights" provision. I think the Senate would be interested in knowing what are the nine States which have taken advantage in recent months of a Federal statute and on their own volition removed themselves from the jurisdiction of Federal rent control. Senate Joint Resolution 207, if passed, will have no force or effect on these nine American States. They are the State of New York, the most populous State in the United States, the State of Texas, not only a large State geographically but a State in which we find some of the most rapidly growing American cities, Houston and Dallas, for example, large, fast, rapidly growing communities which in recent months have gotten along, pretty well by the way, without benefit of Federal rent control administered from on high; the State of Virginia, the State of Utah, the States of Arizona, Nebraska, Alabama, and all of Mississippi except the city of Biloxi.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Was I correct in understanding the distinguished Senator from Washington to say that, if the measure now under consideration should be passed, because of the language it contains, it would have no effect whatever upon the States the Senator has just named?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Wisconsin is quite correct.

Mr. WILEY. In other words, by reason of the fact that a State itself has taken previous action, it has excluded itself from the provisions of the measure, if it shall become law. It has removed itself from any of the effects of the joint resolution unless it is amended so as to contain provisions different from those we expect it to contain, because the measure, after all, merely provides for an extension of the present law.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Wisconsin remains correct. It is my understanding with reference to his sovereign State of Wisconsin that it removed itself, under the authority granted by the Federal statute, from Federal rent controls long since, and has well managed its own field of private property.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator does not know how pleasant it is, after having been engaged in an election campaign, to hear a Senator on the floor say, twice in the same day, that I am correct.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I am sure I shall be given many additional opportunities to make the same statement, if the Senator from Wisconsin should ask me more questions.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. My State of New Jersey, as I understand, and as the Senator's list confirms, did not actually decontrol in the manner in which the Senator has spoken of other States decontrolling.

Mr. CAIN. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. New Jersey has passed legislation which is supposed to take effect on the expiration of the present rent-control legislation on January 1. Therefore, if the Federal law is extended the new State law will come into effect at that time. We will be subject to immediate confusion if a new Federal law on the subject is passed. The question is whether New Jersey will not be better off under the present law than it would be under a new State law, with the possibility of returning in a short time to new Federal controls.

Mr. CAIN. It seems to me the Senator is taking as an assumption that Senate Joint Resolution 207 will be approved tomorrow by the Senate and, presumably, by the House, and that it will extend the present law for 2 months. Therefore, against that assumption, the Senator's own suggestion is that in his view New Jersey would be well advised not to initiate its own rent-control law until the expiration of the additional 60-day period.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Unless I am mistaken New Jersey has passed a law, which is to go into effect when the present law expires. In other words, the New Jersey law was passed to provide a stand-by. The State will put a new law into effect. But now New Jersey is puzzled. The question is whether we would not be well advised to vote for the extension of 2 months, and then study the problem for the future. I wanted the RECORD to show our peculiar local problem at the present time.

Mr. CAIN. It would be my conclusion, and the Senator from New Jersey will tell me if I am wrong, that the people of his State of New Jersey read carefully the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which contained the debate on the subject of rent control 6 months ago. In view of the fact that the people of the State of New Jersey had been told by that RECORD and had found out by a reading of the law itself that the Federal law was going to expire on the 31st day of December 1950, unless any of the cities within New Jersey requested, through action by their city council, an extension of 6 months, the State of New Jersey preferred to say what it thought ought to be done, which was to develop and enact a rent-control law satisfactory to itself, which the State of New Jersey was prepared to initiate on the 1st day of January 1951. It would be my view that the State of New Jersey would be well advised, sir, to take control of this private property regulatory question in its own hands, and the sooner it does so the better off the State of New Jersey will be.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The State of New Jersey might be subject to an over-all Federal control law which might be passed by reason of the war emergency. That is what I am speaking of. In other words, we could go on our own. But if by reason of the war emergency the Congress were to pass an over-all Federal control law, the State of New Jersey would be placed in a peculiar position.

Mr. CAIN. Neither the Senator from New Jersey nor I can judge accurately what the next Congress will do. I would hazard a guess, however, that the Congress of the United States would probably exclude from any Federal rent-control law to be written in the next session those States, and in some instances those cities, which are prepared to prove, as I would assume that New Jersey could, that those States or those cities are as well or better qualified to regulate and manage and administer a system of rent controls within their jurisdiction than is the Federal Government. Admittedly, sir, that is an assumption of what I should like to think would come to pass, because how much happier it is for all citizens, how much more effective it is for the rights of all people if we have a system closer to the people upon whom it is to be imposed.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The Senator from Washington knows that was my position taken earlier this year.

Mr. CAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thought it was time to come to the local level. But we are now presented with a problem which makes the matter confusing.

Mr. CAIN. We are. It is confusing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am obliged to go to a committee meeting. Did the Senator include Tennessee in his list of nine States?

Mr. CAIN. The State of Tennessee, sir, is not listed among the nine States. It is my understanding that some of the cities within Tennessee have been decontrolled within recent months, and other cities have requested an extension of 6 months.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I am sure that while discussing this subject the Senator from Washington would be interested in a telegram I received this morning from Mr. Charles R. Moore, secretary of the Property Owners' Association of Pocatello, Idaho, which reads as follows:

POCATELLO, IDAHO, December 5, 1950.
Senator HENRY DWORSHAK,
Washington, D. C.:

Request you vote against extension of rent controls. Record in this city which has been decontrolled for several months indicates they are not necessary. Controls have a detrimental effect on the construction of new rental units, create an artificial shortage of rentals. They also deter owners from making property improvements. Present low down payments for low-cost homes act as sufficient leverage to keep rents at proper level in this decontrolled area.

CHARLES R. MOORE,
Secretary, Property Owners Association.

Mr. CAIN. The telegram, I may say to the Senator from Idaho reminds me that the facts cannot be too often restated. America developed its first system of rent controls, as I recall, in about the year 1941, or the early part of 1942. In the years which have passed, despite a tremendous volume of private and public construction, America presently has some two-millon-odd fewer units of rental housing than the Nation possessed when rent controls on the Federal level were first imposed. Whatever we do about rent controls in the future, we had better make up our minds that any law we may pass will result in providing additional rental space in which Americans can live, rather than taking away space which they had some years ago.

Scores of American cities have exercised the local-option provision which is a part of the law or have otherwise been decontrolled. I should like to mention only a few, in passing: Augusta, Ga.; Joplin, Mo.; Charlotte, N. C.; Tulsa, Okla.; Charleston, S. C.; Bellingham, Bremerton, Everett, Olympia, and Spokane, Wash.; Bloomington, Ind.; Miami, Fla.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Dallas, Tex.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Richmond, Va.; Salt Lake City, Utah; Birmingham, Ala.; and San Diego, Calif.

So far as I know, the experience of those cities under decontrol has been extraordinarily healthy and beneficial for all their residents and for the business in those communities. Again we should bear in mind that some of those cities have grown rapidly and have surrounding them all the problems which are referred to by the Office of the Housing Expediter in an attempt to frighten so many of us.

Since April 1949 an estimated 8,000,000 rental housing units have been removed from Federal control. If we pass Senate Joint Resolution 207, we veto the home-rule provisions which we fought so hard and so vigorously to make available to the very persons to whom we are inclined to say, tomorrow, "What we gave you but a few months ago we now are desirous of taking away from you."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

Mr. WILEY. The last statement the Senator made provokes this inquiry: Assuming the Senator to be correct about the States which have removed themselves from Federal rent control by means of taking advantage of the provisions of the general statute, what effect will there be upon those States if this joint resolution is enacted?

Mr. CAIN. The enactment of the joint resolution will have no effect on them at all. The joint resolution, if enacted, simply will say to 1,600-odd cities which presently are under Federal rent control, "You shall have taken away from you the right to determine whether you want Federal rent controls to continue in your cities from January 1, 1951, to June 30, 1951." The enactment of the joint resolution will have no force or effect or influence of any kind on any city or State which previously has been decontrolled or removed from Federal rent jurisdiction.

Mr. WILEY. If the respective States took action attempting to delegate that power to the cities within them, what effect would the enactment of this joint resolution have?

Mr. CAIN. If a State has the right to delegate some property-control authority to the cities within its confines, and if those cities have previously been decontrolled, the enactment of Senate Joint Resolution 207 would have no effect.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Wisconsin is most welcome.

Mr. President, by the action which we may take tomorrow, we would compel 1,600 cities and towns who in their local judgment—and I think the cities of the United States of America have a great deal of wisdom—have said, "We do not wish to remain under the regulatory hand of the Federal Government or under Federal Government regulation."

Mr. President, if Congress meant what it said in April, 1949, in heaven's name let us not in December 1950 go back on that promise.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. What was the promise just referred to by the distinguished Senator?

Mr. CAIN. The promise was that the right of self-determination concerning continuance of Federal rent control beyond December 13, 1950, should vest in the cities of America. We put every American city on due notice by saying to them, "Unless, by affirmative action, you say that you want 6 months' additional rent control on December 31, 1950, you will have been removed from Federal supervision in this field."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. How many cities availed themselves of the privilege referred to by the Senator, of determining whether or not they desired a continuation of Federal rent control?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Nebraska will probably be interested in learning that there are approximately 6,600 American cities with populations of 1,000 or more, and as of this moment, 2,400 of those 6,600 cities are under Federal rent control. Of the 2,400 cities now under control, 800 or more have already taken the necessary action locally to insure that they will have rent controls in their cities for a period of 6 months following January 1, 1951.

According to the determination I can make at the moment, 1,600 cities have not as yet taken any action. The guess of the Senator from Nebraska is as good as mine as to how many of those 1,600 cities will, by proper action of their city councils taken between now and the last day of this year, say that they want an additional 6 months of rent control.

The important thing to bear in mind is that every American knows that what I am saying at the moment is a fact, namely, that after an examination of its own local problem, if it thinks it will require an additional 6 months of Federal rent control under the prevailing Federal statute, all it has to do is to request it. In the event Senate Joint Resolution 207 shall be passed by the Senate tomorrow, we shall have taken the position that we know more about the needs of approximately 1,600 cities, located in the various sections of the country, than do those who manage and control and rule those cities. I think such a premise is necessarily untenable, for it assumes that we know more than any one Senator in this room ought to claim credit for knowing, and it again deprives the American city of the right which is too often taken from it, to stand up and determine its own requirements and to shape its own destiny. To my mind it would be a grievous thing, a sad thing, for us, under the circumstances, to tell these 1,600 cities that we of the Congress do not care a whit what the cities think they need, or what they want to do, or what the cities are convinced is the best thing to be done, but that we in the Nation's Capital are going to do their thinking for them. It would be as though we said to them, "Just make up your minds that father knows best, and that father says you are no longer to enjoy the right of thinking for yourselves."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. To sum it up, then, as I understand the Senator's statement, more than 800 cities have already acted under the provisions of the Rent Control Act. Is that correct?

Mr. CAIN. They have acted affirmatively.

Mr. WHERRY. That is, those cities and municipalities have affirmatively determined to enforce rent controls, and therefore the pending measure would be of no particular use to them, because they have already obtained what they would be able to get under the resolution, through adopting rent controls in the local communities. Is that correct?

Mr. CAIN. The pending joint resolution has nothing whatever to do with those 800 cities.

Mr. WHERRY. It has to do only with 1,600 cities which now have the right, and which will continue to have the right until January 1, if the Rent Control Act is not extended, to adopt rent-control measures by action of the city councils, if deemed necessary.

Mr. CAIN. Those cities have had that right for the past 6 months.

Mr. WHERRY. And those cities, if they so decide, may continue to exercise that right after January 1, in the event they desire rent control, may they not?

Mr. CAIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether we ought not to assume that those who are charged with the responsibility of handling these matters in the 1,600 cities are quite as conscious of the problems which confront the country as are we? Is it not logical to assume that they have examined a matter such as this, which so vitally affects their property? Is it not logical for us to assume that, if they find that they need Federal rent controls, they will request a 6 months' extension? If it is logical to make those assumptions, it would seem to the Senator from Washington that it is only logical that he should oppose passage of a measure which would deprive the American city of the right to think for itself.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I am very much interested in getting answers to these questions. Does not the Senator feel that if the joint resolution were not passed, the result would be to possibly place an additional responsibility upon the 600 cities, if they needed rent control, of taking the necessary steps locally to obtain it, prior to January 1, 1951?

Mr. CAIN. I think it likely that most of the State legislatures will be in session during the early part of the year. Answering the Senator's question, I may say that I think the States and municipalities which cease to be under Federal rent control will either determine that they do not need rent control of any character, or, if they determine that they need it, they will effect the proper organization on a State and local level.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand the situation with respect to the State legislatures. If Federal rent control terminates on December 31, then, of course the States may enact their own rent control measures.

Mr. CAIN. That is true.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask, is there anything in the proposed legislation in the way of provision relating to the time element or the procedure which would prevent a city from acting between now and January 1, 1951? Is it not true that any one of those 1,600 cities, if it desired, could adopt local rent control?

Mr. CAIN. To the best of my knowledge, that is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Is there any procedural obstacle, is there any time element which might be involved?

Mr. CAIN. As I understand, the requirement is that, prior to the close of business on December 31, an American municipality now under rent control need only request of the Office of the Housing Expediter, in Washington, D. C., by affirmative action of its city council, a 6 months' extension, and it will be automatically granted.

Mr. WHERRY. Would that be true of the 1,600 cities?

Mr. CAIN. It would.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the point I have in mind.

Mr. CAIN. It is a very important point.

Mr. WHERRY. It is the point I want to make, that they would have that right.

Mr. CAIN. Indeed, they would.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator then thinks there is nothing in the provisions of the act, as presently interpreted, which would foreclose that right on the part of those cities, if they desired to exercise it. Is that correct?

Mr. CAIN. There is nothing that would preclude their exercise of that right, to the best of my knowledge. I may point out that the junior Senator from Washington comes from the city of Tacoma, a city having a population of approximately 140,000 people. Tacoma has not thus far, by action of its city council, requested a 6-months' extension of Federal rent control, nor has it adopted any resolution requesting decontrol. As of the time of my departure for Washington 2 weeks ago, the Tacoma city council was continuing its studies, in the light of new circumstances, to determine whether it desired to request an extension of Federal rent control. At that time, other cities had indicated conclusively that there was no need of an extension. If any changes occur in connection with the great Fort Lewis situation in the 2 weeks, it would follow that the city council of Tacoma could request a 6 months' extension. That would be within its legal right. If we pass the joint resolution tomorrow, we say to the city of Tacoma, "We care not how long you have been studying this question—we are going to make up your minds for you."

I desire to make one further observation, if the Senator will permit, without too much prejudice to the Office of the Housing Expediter. To my knowledge, there has been an effort within recent weeks to sell the subject of extending Federal rent control to cities throughout the land. Efforts are made to portray the dire consequences to cities which do not request the 6-months' extension of Federal rent control. The Office of the Housing Expediter is not quite satisfied with it. The Expediter does not think it permits his office to go far enough, and fear that the Office of the Housing Expediter may be unable to frighten some cities which, on the basis of their own study, know there is nothing about which they should be frightened. The Office of the Expediter desires the passage of the pending joint resolution, in order that it may capture in its net every one of the 1,600 cities.

We may allow the Office of the Housing Expediter to do this. It will be the business of every Senator to decide that question in voting tomorrow. But if we pass the joint resolution, it is my judgment that we shall have driven another nail into the coffin of home rule, responsibility, and sovereignty so far as the cities of America are concerned. I happen to be one Senator who is going to listen to a city council about any problem concerning which the council ought to know a great deal more than does the Senator from Washington. If the city of Tacoma wants 6 months' extension of Federal rent control, though I personally might dissent for economic reasons, as a Member of the United States Senate I say that is the business of the city of Tacoma. We gave to that city the right to make up its mind, and I, for one, shall not vote tomorrow to take away that right.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Possibly the Senator may have discussed this point, but what argument does the Housing Expediter make, or do those who are in favor of extending rent control make, in contravention of the position just taken by the Senator from Washington? I should like a brief observation by the Senator. I do not want to burden him, but to allow him to take as much time as he wants.

Mr. CAIN. That is a very fair question, and I should like to answer it as best I can.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to know what the answer is.

Mr. CAIN. The proponents of the joint resolution, so far as I can understand from their arguments, say that it may be necessary to have a new, larger, and more rigorous Federal rent-control law, and therefore we should not permit the present law to expire on December 31, 1950, but should extend it for 60 days, so that the new Congress may have an opportunity to make up its mind as to what ought to be done. It is obvious that the rent-control law of the land will not expire on December 31, 1950. Now that 800 cities have requested an extension of 6 months, it is very logical to assume that other cities will have made such a request by December 31, 1950. We shall therefore continue to have a Federal rent-control law for 800 or more cities.

It would be my own judgment that if the United States faces a national emergency requiring a total mobilization of its resources and assets and manpower, it will probably be found that a Federal rent-control law will be required in the future. But I ought to make it clear that such a law must be a new piece of legislation, it must be a law in keeping with the requirements, not of 1941 or 1942, but in keeping with the requirements of 1951 and 1952. We are going to need a law—if we shall need any law—which will be completely dissimilar from the law we now have. The greatest favor I can think of granting to the new Congress, with particular reference to the Banking and Currency Committee, would be to afford it a full and free opportunity to take testimony, and to write and design a new law which would work without any further relationship or reference to the present rent-control law, which is outmoded and archaic and unfair, and which is not working, in thousands of instances, to bring simple, common justice to American citizens. I have endeavored to state the argument of the proponents, and I have stated my view of why I think it is not a valid argument.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish to thank the Senator for his brief explanation, and for having given us his observations with respect to the argument of the proponents. I should, however, like to ask one more question. What are the mechanics? Let us assume that a city wished to take advantage of the opportunity to enforce local rent control. Let us assume that they indicated such a desire. What would it be necessary for the city to do? I have read the law, but I should like to know what the city would be required to do. In other words, could a city merely indicate that it wished to take advantage of the 6 months' extension, or would the city have to provide its own rent control?

Mr. CAIN. I shall answer the question of the Senator in part at this time, and I shall answer it in full as soon as I am able to do so. Only cities which are now under control may request an extension of 6 months beyond December 31.

Mr. WHERRY. What is the situation with reference to the 1,600 cities to which reference has been made?

Mr. CAIN. The 1,600 cities are those which are presently under control but which have not yet requested an extension of 6 months.

Mr. WHERRY. What must they do if they wish to have an extension of 6 months?

Mr. CAIN. That is provided for in the law, a copy of which I am endeavoring to obtain.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the answer lie in the pending joint resolution?

Mr. CAIN. No. I shall be glad to read from the law as soon as I have it before me. I am not completely familiar with the mechanics involved, but any city may by affirmative action of its city council pass an instrument—rarely an ordinance, and in most cases a resolution—which says in effect: "We, the city council, on this date have resolved that we want to extend Federal rent control for an additional 6 months." That instrument is certified and sent to the Office of the Housing Expediter. It is stamped "Approved," and that is all there is to it.

Mr. WHERRY. That is what I wanted to know. Apparently the time element does not work against them. The procedure involved does not work against them. In other words, if the act is not extended tomorrow a city would have from now until January 1 to take such affirmative action?

Mr. CAIN. My understanding is that the Senator from Nebraska is precisely correct. However, I wish to say further that if we pass the joint resolution tomorrow, the next Congress will be confronted with the question: "What do we want to do about the law which is now on the books?" Therefore, Congress will be concerned with a law which has not worked and with the management of a law which is wholly suspect by practically every thinking person in America. It is interesting and unusual to note that the Office of the Housing Expediter is as badly thought of by the Committee for Industrial Organization as it is by the property owners of America. Everyone dislikes and has a minimum of respect for the Office of the Housing Expediter, although admittedly the reasons for such disrespect and dislike vary.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator has stated that the proponents of the resolution which would extend rent control desire to continue the Rent Control Act for 60 days so that the next Congress will be able to provide a more rigorous and broadened Rent Control Act. If the need is acute and present next year—and it may be—would it not be as simple to submit a brand-new bill after the present act has expired in order to accomplish what the proponents of the joint resolution seek to accomplish by a continuance of the present act?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Nebraska and I could not possibly be more in agreement. If circumstances at the next session of Congress require a broadened and, let us say, total rent control law, it should be a new law. It should be written on the basis of the requirements and needs of that day. It should have no relationship or bear any semblance of relationship to a law which has been on the statute books for some years and which has never worked in a sound and equitable way. Although it has been fair enough to some people, it has been totally unfair to tens of thousands of other Americans. It seems to me that any law which Congress writes should provide justice to everyone.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CAIN. Before the Senator from Nebraska leaves the Chamber, I should like to read the following section of the present law, dealing with the steps which a city must take in order to obtain a 6 months' extension of the rent-control law:

SEC. 5. Section 204 (j) (3) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(3) The Housing Expediter shall terminate the provisions of this title in any incorporated city, town, village, or in the unincorporated area of any county upon receipt of a resolution of its governing body adopted for that purpose in accordance with applicable local law and based upon a finding by such governing body reached as the result of a public hearing held after 10 days' notice, that there no longer exists such a shortage in rental housing accommodations as to require rent control in such city, town, village, or unincorporated area in such county——"

Mr. WHERRY. Does not that section refer to decontrol?

Mr. CAIN. Yes; I wanted to follow it immediately with the proviso with respect to the continuance of controls.

Mr. WHERRY. I believe it is on page 23.

Mr. CAIN. I have before me Public Law 574, Eighty-first Congress. The following section, when read in conjunction with the other section, provides a clear picture of the situation with respect to a city which either decontrols or continues controls:

SEC. 4. Section 204 (f) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(f) (1) The provisions of this title, except section 204 (a), shall cease to be in effect at the close of December 31, 1950, except that they shall cease to be in effect at the close of June 30, 1951—

"(A) in any incorporated city, town, or village which, at a time when maximum rents under this title are in effect therein, and prior to December 31, 1950, declares (by resolution of its governing body adopted for that purpose, or by popular referendum, in accordance with local law) that a shortage of rental housing accommodations exists which requires the continuance of rent control in such city, town, or village."

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it under the latter provision that the 800 cities have continued rent control?

Mr. CAIN. Any city which desires an extension of 6 months is required simply to prepare an instrument, approved by its city council. That is the end of it. Eight hundred cities have taken action under that section. Sixteen hundred cities have the right to do it between now and the last day of this year.

Mr. WHERRY. I believe paragraph 2 answers my question. It reads:

(2) Any incorporated city, town, or village which makes the declaration specified in paragraph (1) (A) of this subsection shall notify the Housing Expediter in writing of such action promptly after it has been taken.

Mr. CAIN. That is what I have previously indicated. The only action a city is required to take is to notify the Housing Expediter in writing.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the machinery by which they may retain rent control?

Mr. CAIN. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. No prohibition is in effect. They need not follow any particular procedure. All they need to do is have a meeting and authorize a continuance of rent control. By doing so the city comes under class A.

Mr. CAIN. There is one little provision in the law—I do not wish to call it a gimmick—which says that if a city wishes to decontrol under the local option clause of the law it must signify its intention to that effect by holding public hearings. However, if a city wishes to continue rent control all it is required to do is pass a simple resolution to that effect. Without being unduly critical, I know that, from a very serious anxiety and concern for the welfare of the American people, generally the Housing Expediter will, with considerable alacrity, help in transmitting his approval to any city which wants a continuation of Federal rent control.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I shall be glad to yield if I am permitted to do so.

Mr. MALONE. I know that the junior Senator from Washington has made a very detailed study of this entire subject. Therefore, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. CAIN. I am glad to yield for a question.

Mr. MALONE. Because of the lateness of the date and the convening of most State legislatures some time in January, would there be any reason, in the Senator's opinion, for extending the opportunity to either escape or continue with rent control for a period of 30 days beyond the present expiration date?

Mr. CAIN. I can only say in all seriousness that from my point of view no sound purpose would be achieved if that suggestion were adopted. To repeat, I say that for the reason that Federal rent controls are not going to expire in America on the last day of this year.

Mr. MALONE. Except in the case of cities which have not taken action.

Mr. CAIN. Yes; but let us stay with that question a moment and see if we are not in agreement.

There are 2,400 American cities now under Federal rent control. Federal rent control will expire for all of those 2,400 cities which, by the close of business on December 31 of this year, have not requested an extension of 6 months. Eight hundred of the two thousand four hundred cities have already requested such an extension. Between now, the 6th day of December, and the last day of this year, x number of additional cities will have requested such extension. For the first 6 months of next year there will be just as much Federal rent control for those cities which have requested an extension as there is today. The Congress of the United States put the cities of America on notice fully 6 months ago that they could either decontrol themselves or request an extension. I think the question which the Senator raises is not valid, because to extend the law for any period of time beyond December 31, 1950, would simply in substance be saying to all the cities, "We gave you the right to make up your minds, and now we have concluded that you do not know how to make up your minds, so we of the Congress, who know best, are going to do your thinking for you." That is the fundamental basis of my argument against extension.

Mr. MALONE. The distinguished junior Senator from Washington is fully aware of the strong position which the junior Senator from Nevada has often taken, namely that local control is far better than congressional control two or three thousand miles away, and should be protected at all times.

Mr. CAIN. I am conscious of that.

Mr. MALONE. Will the junior Senator from Washington explain why his amendment to the joint resolution, submitted on December 5, would be necessary, provided the joint resolution were to pass? In other words, is there some misunderstanding of the law with respect to resolutions of a governing body or an official body, so that it is necessary in some manner to legalize the decisions of some areas?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to answer that question. However, it is a very long story. I shall answer as briefly as I can.

As the result of an appeal by some interested parties in Los Angeles, Calif., taken to the circuit court of appeals, the circuit court recently ruled that in its opinion the Congress meant, when it wrote this local-option provision, that a community could either request extension or take decontrol action only through a city ordinance, and not through a resolution. Obviously, any judge has the right to make any decision he deems proper.

The dilemma which now faces us, and because of which I submitted an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 207 yesterday, is that if the Supreme Court of the United States upholds the circuit court of appeals' decision, it means that the action taken by 800 American cities through resolutions to extend rent controls for 6 months into 1951 will be invalid, that comparable resolutions resulting in decontrol of rents in scores of American cities will likewise be invalid, and that all the parties at issue, both property owners and tenants, must have recourse to the courts of the land. The single purpose of the amendment of yesterday was to validate all of the city actions taken in the past, either for extension or decontrol.

Mr. MALONE. Regardless of whether or not it was done by city ordinance or by resolution.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. The junior Senator from Nevada favored the first extension, containing the local option provision relating to the action of cities, counties, or other subdivisions decontrolling by resolution, but with the approval of the Governor of the State. In some of the States, including my own State of Nevada, it was found that the Governor refused to approve several of the resolutions. Therefore the next time rent control was extended the junior Senator from Nevada was heartily in favor of taking the Governor out of the play entirely and leaving it entirely to the local areas, because, as the distinguished junior Senator from Washington has so ably explained—and that is also the opinion of the junior Senator from Nevada—no one understands a local situation as well as does a city council, and the people who live in the particular city or area. Therefore it is the opinion of the junior Senator from Nevada that such a local option provision was very fair.

Mr. CAIN. Six months ago the Congress and the President agreed with the view just announced by the junior Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MALONE. That is true. As I understand, it is the opinion of the junior Senator from Washington that ample time has been given, and that there is nothing between now and January 1 to prevent any city which has not already requeste dextension, or to be relieved of all regulations, to take the proper action through resolution, which I understand the junior Senator from Washington to say he believes was the intention of Congress in the first place. In other words, it was the intention that it could be done merely by a resolution.

Mr. CAIN. I think it was the intention of the Congress, including the very distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and other members of his committee, both Republicans and Democrats, as well as Members of the Senate generally, and

Members of the House of Representatives, that the intention of the Congress—and the President signed his name to the measure—was to permit the cities of America, by any legal means within their authority, to decontrol or to ask for an extension.

Mr. MAYBANK rose.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. I should like very much to have the explanation of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee.

If I may add a further point, it is often almost impossible even for a city council to pass an ordinance in a short time, because there are certain technicalities which must be complied with, whereas a resolution is a different thing. I should like very much to hear the explanation of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee on that point.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will yield, I shall be glad to comment.

Mr. CAIN. I shall be grateful to the Senator from South Carolina for his comments.

Mr. MAYBANK. I am fully aware of the fact that 2 days after the President signed his name to the bill war broke out in Korea. Conditions today are entirely different from what they were last year when we passed the bill. I made the statement that I did not think the present Congress should consider a new rent-control bill, because it would not have time to write a proper bill. I believe that a rent-control bill should be written in keeping with the all-over control act, which has not been sufficiently used, to my way of thinking. Nevertheless, we have not the time in this Congress to write a new rent-control bill.

I do not believe that the present Congress should undertake, within the short time remaining in this session, to write permanent legislation, in view of the fact that the next Congress will meet in January. It was for that reason that I suggested an extension under States' rights and under city rights to continue for 2 months, which would give some cities an opportunity to continue rent control for 6 months under the present law.

The distinguished Senator from Washington has been addressing a group of mayors on the subject of the decision of the circuit court of appeals. He and I are both former mayors. For many years both of us belonged to the United States Conference of Mayors. I happened to hold a small office in that organization at one time. The executive director of the Conference of Mayors has written me as follows:

> The decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on November 24 last has thrown the whole rent control situation into confusion. In spite of the patently clear provisions of the bill passed earlier this year the Court's decision in effect holds that all resolutions adopted by city councils in accordance with local law (for either decontrol or continuation up to June 30 next) are invalid. The court held only ordinances were legal.
> Because of the very great possibility that the United States Supreme Court cannot act on the appeal before December 31 it would seem that the only way the situation could be met would be to add a proviso to Senate Joint Resolution 207 which is now before the Senate. I would most strongly urge that the resolution be amended in line with the attached memo in order to take care of this legal situation in which the cities find themselves as a result of the court of appeals' decision.
> With best wishes always, I am,
>
> Yours sincerely,
>
> PAUL V. BETTERS,
> Executive Director.

Mr. Betters was one of those who testified, as my good friend from Washington knows. I had intended to mention this memorandum, if the Senator from Washington did not do so. As a matter of fact, I believe the Senator from Washington attended the meeting of the Conference of Mayors on the morning of the day I happened to meet with some of them in the afternoon.

I understand that the Senator from Washington is not for the joint resolution, even with the amendment. I have not studied the details of the amendment, but I am having it studied now. I intend to accept some amendment which would protect the municipalities of this country. At one time I had the honor to be a member of the Conference of Mayors.

Mr. CAIN. The intention of the amendment which I submitted yesterday to Senate Joint Resolution 207 is merely to validate all the actions in the form of resolutions taken by the cities, for or against control.

Mr. MAYBANK. I talked with the Senator before he went to speak to the mayors.

Mr. CAIN. I understand that the committee staff is not only sympathetic toward the amendment, but hopes to be able to recommend its inclusion in the joint resolution.

Mr. MAYBANK. I know that something of the sort must be included, because of the possibility of the Supreme Court not acting. I certainly intend to accept the Senator's amendment, or to work out something jointly. I would not commit myself as to the exact wording. I wanted to have that matter made perfectly clear.

I further wish to say to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] that the joint resolution simply provides for an extension of 2 months. We have no bill dealing with the subject. However, if the war situation does not become better in another year—which we all hope and pray it will—we shall be obliged to deal with the matter. Let us deal with it then in connection with a defense bill, in connection with a bill having to do with the Military Establishment.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I know that courts often consider the intent of Congress if the intent is clear. I understand from the distinguished Senator from Washington that he believes, as does the junior Senator from Nevada, that the intent of Congress was that a resolution of a city council would be sufficient.

Mr. CAIN. It would be my consideration that there would be no one in this body who would dissent from that view.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator asked me the same question, and I will say that that was the view held by the committee.

Mr. CAIN. And testimony to that effect was offered in the hearing before the committee held the other day.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is correct.

Mr. CAIN. I shall proceed as rapidly as possible, sir, to answer questions as best I can, as I am always interested in the field of property management and the rights which belong to American citizens.

Now, Mr. President, let us examine the justification for Senate Joint Resolution 207, as advanced by its proponents—as found in the committee report. Bear in mind always that in our discussion of this proposed legislation we are concerning ourselves only with 1,600 cities out of a national total of 6,600 American cities whose population exceeds 1,000.

The report states "In many of these same areas"—meaning these 1,600 cities—"it has been and will continue to be necessary to house many more people due to an increase in defense production or activation of military establishments after December 31, 1950."

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so I may make one more observation?

Mr. CAIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I wish to say for the benefit of the Senator from Nevada that the joint resolution, if passed, would take away no rights from the communities or the cities which we have previously extended. It is our intention to leave the same provisions in it as are contained in the law, so any cities can, by their own action, decontrol.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, with all due deference to my colleague, I would have to take positive exception to what he has just said, for, in my opinion anyway, I hold that the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 207 takes away the most important right of all which had previously been given to the American cities, namely, the right of self-determination. The law of the land as it now stands, and as it was passed about 6 months ago, said to any American city of some 2,400 cities: "Between now and the 31st day of December 1950 you shall be given a choice to determine whether you want to request an extension of controls for 6 months, or if you do not, the law, inasmuch as it affects you, will expire on the 31st day of December 1950." The passage of the joint resolution tomorrow will say to these 1,600 cities now under control, but which have not requested another 6 months' extension, "We meant no such thing."

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield, because that is the hub around which the whole argument now revolves.

Mr. MAYBANK. The extension of 2 months merely means that cities which
